A Word of Advice to the Local Lush

The demand for Coors in San Diego was so great during August of 1974 that the distributing house closed for several days.

In San Diego, the Coors distributing house was overwhelmed with orders for the popular Colorado lager. The demand was so high that the warehouse was empty in just a few days, forcing the company to temporarily close operations.

Many consumers complained about the lack of Coors, with some even suggesting that the company should be fined for not being able to meet the demand. However, Coors officials explained that the unusually hot summer weather had caused a surge in demand for their product, which they were unable to predict.

As a result, Coors had to ration sales, limiting each customer to a certain number of cases. This led to long lines and frustration among consumers, who were used to having Coors available at any time.

The company apologized for the inconvenience and promised to increase production to meet future demands. They also advised consumers to call their local stores for updates on when Coors would be available again.

Despite the temporary closure, Coors remained committed to serving their customers and ensuring that they continued to enjoy their favorite lager.
