"Home is the place where, when you have to go there, they have to take you in." — Robert Frost, Draft of the Home Men

The "Home American Market" is on the corner of Fifth Avenue and National City Boulevard in the Market Street. A sign above the door says: "Chop Suey Supplies." Dark green plastic chairs, worn and dirty black, hundred-pound sacks of flour, stacked in rows beside lush oranges and pineapples, are piled high. The door is crusted with yellow in the edges of bloodshot eyes sit on the sidewalk. The Zebra Club, the City Rescue Mission. A white neon sign atop the building's roof above them, it proclaims: "Jesus Saves" to Frank Pool Hall, the Zebra Club, the ABC Club, the Hotel of the Home of God's Extended Hand.

The old lady stands at the top of the steps, her hands clasped behind her back, looking down at the architecture. Other forms move past her like shadows, restlessly. Old women, bent over and weary, slipper, hair in curtains. Men of indeterminate age, half drunk, laughing in themselves. A tall blonde woman, wearing a green silk mandarin blouse, walks past. "I'm from Texas," she says. "An empty just bottle of perfume, says on the first tag, for me now, then it's time to go in advance. Probably nowhere in San Diego, I mean, there ain't no place able. If you're poor, really poor, the hotel's at the end of the line where the tracks are. You can get a room a night or $60 a month."

Two long hallways run the length of the two-story building. On either side of each hallway are individual rooms, called "single room accommodations." The rooms are ten feet by ten feet by seven feet in size. A cot sits in the middle of each room, a chair, a cardboard box for possessions, and empty bottles of beer on the floor. There is a bathroom on each floor. There is a shower.

"Come here the 19th of June," he says. "I know all their id, all their names. They're all here. It continues from day to day. I know more about their business than they do. Everybody comes and tells me, because they know that if anybody can help,

"I'll help 'em." Hazel San Nicolas comes from the room across the hall. She is 70 years old, with green eyes, wavy gray-brown hair. Shrewd, tough, she has a way of looking at people. "People, everybody's here to help or do something if they can." She is a widow, who has lived in San Diego since the end of the war. She remembers the names of the city that few people knew with.

"People do helping each other around here, that's one thing. And just like the people in this little hotel, they're all here. They're all here, people, everybody's here to help or do something if they can." She is a widow, who has lived in San Diego since the end of the war. She remembers the names of the city that few people knew with.

"If I don't see these people anymore, I'll be worried about them. You know what time they usually come out? I find some dead people over there, and that's not even funny."

She sits in a chair, a simple wooden chair in the corner of the
