Heaven Is My Billboard

JEANETTE DEWYZE

It is one hour before takeoff at the skywriting capital of the world, and Greg Stinis is tinkering with his airplanes. The smog of Long Beach glows brown overhead, but the sky above it is blue enough for a celestial billboard. Today is Sunday, so the message will salute Solo'caine (Coppertone has dibs on Saturdays), and now all Stinis has to do is set his aeronautical typewriter airborne.

He clambers out of one AT-6 cockpit, mutters a quick explanation. "We're just having a little problem with the electronics. I should be able to patch it up in a minute. On the airfield, he is a dynamo, racing under the wings of his bright red, World War II-vintage vintage flock like an anxious mother hen. Stinis is used to soothing cranky airplanes, just as he's used to worrying about whether the sky will be clear or whether the wind will rend his handiwork. Those are just sub-worries of the one big worry: namely, just how much longer will people pay him to hang smoky ads in the firmament.

So far, the business has put food on the Stinis table for two generations. Greg's dad, Andy, was one of skywriting's founding fathers, and he invented the modern form of "skytyping." The senior Stinis also was crafty enough to patent the process, so now the family boasts that it's the only outfit in the world with the right to "type" celestial messages. The company has only two offices in the United States and keeps most of its planes at Long Beach, that alone makes the LA suburb the aerial advertising mecca.

Operating out of it, the fleet regularly inscribes messages over the beaches ranging from San Diego to Santa Barbara, occasionally decorating other heavens throughout the West. A New York office handles

"Each skytyped letter is as tall as the Empire State Building, and most messages are about five miles long. When we put them up at 10,000 feet, you can see them for 20 miles in each direction."

Lick 'Em And Stick 'Em

Two weeks ago newspaper reporters around the state opened their weekly mailing from Mayor Pete Wilson to find a two-page analysis of State Assemblyman Ken Maddy's voting record. Both Maddy and Wilson are all but formally declared as candidates for governor, yet reporters were amazed that Wilson would attack a fellow Republican so early in the running.

Calls to Wilson and campaign press secretary Larry Thomas yielded immediate apologies and assurances that the analysis, which dubbed Maddy a liberal masquerading as a conservative to woo right-wing support in the June primary, was included in the mailing totally by mistake. Thomas said the report was "an internal campaign document" that should have never gotten out of the campaign office and the mayor apologized for the mistake. Yet some reporters remained skeptical. Maddy, a young lawyer from the Fresno area, has gotten attention in the early gubernatorial maneuverings since he released information showing he had raised $400,000 for the upcoming campaign, a sum more than twice that raised by Wilson or any other Republican hopeful. Wilson, the skeptics point out, is known for his attention to the smallest of details. "A lot of people think it wasn't a mistake," said one local reporter, "but the only ones who know for sure are his staff, and we've got to take their word on it."

But the incident had an unsettling touch of deja vu for City Councilman Lee Hubbard, who in 1975 opposed Wilson's re-election bid. In the head of that mayoral campaign exactly two years ago, Evening Tribune reporter John Kern obtained a two-page analysis of Hubbard's campaign contributions, which had been prepared by Wilson's staff. Like the recent Maddy analysis, the document on Hubbard was labeled an "internal campaign document" that was not to have been distributed outside the campaign office. But in the end, it, too, saw wide distribution.

Press secretary Thomas says the two incidents are totally different. The Maddy analysis was mistakenly mailed to the press when it could have been used more effectively at a later date. The Hubbard information, on the other hand, was leaked to the press on purpose by a campaign worker interested in building a strong case for Wilson's re-election. And Thomas claims Hubbard himself distributed the Wilson memo to expose what he felt were underhanded tactics.

But the explanations and apologies are all a little far-fetched for Hubbard, who steps down from his council seat later this year. "It was a repeat performance of the mayoral campaign right down to the apologies."

5,000 Chula Vistans To Imitate Honking Aardvarks In Lagoon Soon

Six years ago, when the Stanford Research Institute researchers said a Jules Verne-style Disneyland could make money in San Diego County, everyone thought in terms of the North County. All kinds of people would live close enough to drive to it, they figured; it could naturally compete with Anaheim. But the years passed, the plans changed, now "Captain Nemo's Secret Harbor" is supposed to bloom in the hot dust of Otay Mesa, and no more fancy studies have surfaced. No matter. South Bay business leaders are drooling at the vision and developers say plans are moving ahead.

"This idea is not a baby that is still in diapers," says realtor Ray Zuniga, a gravel-voiced, dark-skinned man who moved to San Ysidro 32 years ago. "They spent a half million dollars on that study and the San Diego City Council already has approved the idea in concept." One of the principal forces behind the project, Zuniga came up with the idea of promoting the South Bay site after North County residents turned thumbs down on it a few years ago, and the realtor's impassivity melts into eloquence when he talks about Nemo's potential customers.

"We already have 30 million people each year crossing the border and they have no place to spend time here. If we could tap just 10 million of those, it would be a go. We have a major international airport in Tijuana and we would launch a campaign for South and Central America with their tremendous potential for tourists. Brown Field could be developed into a major charter flight field...San Diego itself already is a tourist attraction," and Zuniga dreams how mass transit will lace it together in the future.

Zuniga isn't an officer in the development corporation; instead, he's only handling the real estate acquisitions for it and he says those are "proceeding on schedule." Construction shouldn't start for a year to a year and a half, and in the meantime, the realtor is drumming up community support for the project, not too difficult in the economically lean South Bay. Zuniga predicts that the park, which will cost close to $300 million and is supposed to feature dozens of rides and a 250-acre lagoon, would create close to 5,000 permanent jobs for the community.

JOHN FERRARI

Four-lane Backdrop

The last remaining farm in Mission Valley may seem improbable, but it's come to look almost invincible over the years. The farm is the one east-west commuters know so well, the one Interstate 8 bisects, east of the 805 freeway. It has survived among the growth for so long that the 'For Sale' signs began to look like a joke. Now, however, the sign over the farm's north section has come down and the developer's sign has replaced it, and it's hard to believe the improbable has yielded to the inevitable.

Woven into life on the farm is John Ferrari, a short man with a rounding belly who crowns his tanned face with a Stetson hat. John tends the north part of the farm where the horses graze, while his brother, Gene, lives on the southern section. John recalls the days when the farm was only one among many.

His father settled on it around the turn of the century, joining a brother who'd earlier emigrated from Italy. The family raised vegetables until 1914, then opened a dairy on more than 30 acres. The elder Ferrari died in 1949, then catastrophe struck again a year later when the new four-lane highway to El Cajon took the load off Camino del Rio. The Ferraris' barn was on the south side of the new thoroughfare, their 500 cows were on the north, so they herded the cows home every night through an underground tunnel.

The brothers survived another road widening in 1960, but eight years later they'd had enough of urban dairy farming. A final expansion five years ago claimed the south land. Today the Ferraris are close-mouthed about the finances surrounding the land; John simply says the property is being sold to settle the family estate. The small south section still is up for sale but escrow on the north part should close by February (sooner if the developer gets all his permits).

Planned are a hotel, two restaurants, and an office building. At the moment, however, the animals (mostly horses) remain. Farming's been John Ferrari's life and he can't imagine giving it up, so he's looking for another piece of land somewhere.

He stares north at the massive shadow of the stadium, then wheels around to scan the soaring 805 interchange. He chuckles when he thinks of leaving behind the concrete neighbors and the constant whoosh of traffic. Still, he's not particularly happy about his departure. "I'll really miss not being right here in the center of things."

COLETTE MICHELLE

Ask A Woman Who Owns One

If you're a single man and you're lonely, and you freeze when you try to meet women, you probably never mastered the rules of the mating game. And though you may not be ready for charm school, Colette Michelle, a self-proclaimed teacher of "masculine survival," is standing by to help.

Ms. Michelle, as her name suggests, is French. She is petite, wears her hair in a blond bob, and though she's lived in San Diego for 18 years, her accent remains decidedly Gallic. In her 40s, she wears her age with grace.

Her business is charm, and she's a dynamo at projecting it. For the most part, she's dished it out to female students, but last year she started analyzing friends' divorces and decided "there are certain things that men don't know about women." Charging to the rescue, she pulled her materials together and presented them in an adult school course last spring, a course which she'll repeat this month. In response to letters, she's also compiled a mail-order course covering everything from male toenail care to pick-ups. Her philosophy is explicit. "I believe strongly that seduction is an art and that women enjoy being seduced. If there are a few men who can do it, why can't the rest of them?" Thus, the course is a primer on sexual stalking, from body language to background music.

Her suggestions are as specific as any battle plan. Consider hands, for example. Colette cautions, "Remember that at times you will have a woman's body under the power of your hands." So keep your nails short. Use a pumice stone. Try a nongreasy hand lotion. Hair should be washed each morning. Fragrance should be dabbed on the mustache, and mustache wearers should learn "special tricks" for kissing.

She also believes in singles bars; recommends the Bratskellar, El Torito, and the Oz Club ("But if you enjoy mental women, go on Saturdays to the library"). She tells men to meet women by walking their dogs in Balboa Park, or at that other old stand by, the beach. She warns students also to "case" restaurants beforehand so they can impress female companions with their knowledge.

If this sounds like it's right out of a Doris Day movie, Colette admits to believing in "the strong man...the macho without the macho rigidity. The man who can cry, who is sensitive, but who still knows how to take care of his woman." Is she a Marabel Morgan for men? Colette recoils at the thought. Morgan's "total women," she says, are insipid and hopelessly submissive. She boasts that her own women are liberated—out of bed, anyway ("There's domination in sex only; man is the leader").

If Colette's approach is frankly sexual, at least she avoids being coy. To confuse a woman, she counsels, "try not to go to bed with her on the first night." The second night she'll be that much more eager. "You kiss a woman when she least expects it, but at the right moment....Talk to her mind and her body will follow."

Already assailed by some feminists, Colette greets the attack calmly; her defense is rooted firmly in the status quo. People have assumed social roles for ages, she argues, and those roles help smooth out the rough edges. "As long as the games are played, why not take advantage of them?"

Coming Of Age

Whisper the words "Ocean Beach Planning Board" and you can still send shivers up many a conservative spine. Yet the board is looking more Establishment every day. In January, it acquired an office in the OB Free School and in July it gained a full-time staff—more sophisticated trappings than any other comparable group in San Diego County.

The office is rent-free, but the board snared about $35,000 in federal (CETA) money to hire the staff. CETA funds haven't been granted to any other planning group, and board member Lars Tollefson hopes the experience will serve as a model. The staff, funded through May, includes an office manager with a Master's degree in urban planning and two other workers who are surveying housing in Ocean Beach.

Funding requirements prohibit the staff from doing any political work for the board, but Tollefson expresses confidence the funding won't constrain him and his fellow planners. He's certain the money is a blessing, but other board members had their doubts about creeping bureaucratization. Recalls Tollefson, "It was a very close vote over whether we should apply at all. Some members feared a staff might take over some of the board's planning authority."

Impresario About That

When Tito Capobianco took over as general director of the San Diego Opera early this year, he announced a series of programs that matched his reputation: a summer festival highlighting the works of Verdi, a training program for young soloists taught in part by Beverly Sills, the addition of a sixth production to the company's schedule. All were steps towards fulfilling Capobianco's pledge to make the previously low-key opera "as important as the Zoo."

Along with the new programs, the director brought in a new staff. Three professionals who had worked with Capobianco at the San Francisco Opera came south to assume roles with the administrative and production end of the local company. Pat O'Neill now handles public relations and fundraising; Steve Jordan is the new production coordinator; Joe DeRugeriis directs the opera's choir. Don Abrams, who worked under Capobianco at the New York City Opera, came west to assume duties as lighting director. Today, only two staffers who had worked under the opera's founder and former director, Walter Herbert, remain with the company.

In the wake of all the hiring and firing stands a group of very disillusioned former employees. "Capobianco had every right to let us go and hire all new people," says former public relations director Shelly Smalling, "but I think he could have done it with a little more grace." Smalling, now publicity coordinator for Home Federal Savings, walked into her office at the opera one day last May to be handed her resignation papers by Capobianco.

Bruce Kelly handled lighting chores for the opera since its premiere performance in 1965, but this season his contract was left unrenewed. "I got a letter from Capobianco, but there wasn't a satisfactory reason for my dismissal." Kelly, whose work was praised by local music critics, says the opera's board of directors still believes he turned down the job because he was too busy with other projects. "That's not true," he says bitterly, "and I plan to let the board know I'm disappointed that I wasn't rehired."

Production carpenter Jon Salyer, another 12-year veteran, was working out details on a contract for the 1977-78 season when the opera cut off negotiations. "We'd agreed on salary and were talking about the number of weeks I'd work when a friend told me the company was looking for a new carpenter. They never even gave me a chance to turn down their last offer. Maybe I'm kind of naive, but I dealt with them in good faith."

Ken Caswell, who as general manager shared power with Capobianco before former director Herbert died, had left earlier to take over control of the Memphis (Tennessee) Opera Theatre. And four other staffers have resigned or retired since Capobianco assumed sole operating control of the local company. Opera president Josiah Neeper says Caswell and Capobianco worked "relatively well together," but others say Caswell left because he foresaw a power struggle with the fiery Argentinian, one that he had little chance of winning.

Neeper, who speaks for the opera when Capobianco travels, says many of the original staffers were replaced because of a "substantial reorganization" of duties. He refused to comment on the replacement of Smalling, Kelly, and Salyer. Most of those who are now without jobs agree that Capobianco must have the freedom to assemble his own staff, but that concession doesn't mitigate their bitterness. "He's got to have poeple he can trust, people he's worked with before," says one former employee. "Still, those of us who struggled from the beginning got stepped on. I learned real fast that ruthlessness will get you everywhere in the performing arts."

STRAIGHT FROM THE HIP

MATTHEW ALICE

Dear Matthew Alice:
My boyfriend is 33 years old and is losing his hair. He says it doesn't bother him, but I know it secretly does. What can I do?
Jody J.
North Park

Tell him Julius Caesar was bald. And so is Elton John. Tell him to join a weekend baseball team, then let him wear his hat around the house. Tell him you love bald men—even his father. But for God's sake don't say there is no known cause for baldness, and neither a cure. Nobody knows for sure why some men's follicles—the tiny bundles of specialized cells embedded in the deepest layer of the skin—simply cease to work. They don't die, but neither do they continue to produce new cells that turn into fibers of protein called keratin. This keratin is the basic matter of hair, and in some animals is also the basic matter of horns.

And here the truth hurts. It appears that testosterone—the male hormone—is in some way involved with baldness. It is known that follicles near the front of the scalp, which are usually the first to fall asleep, metabolize testosterone faster than do other follicles. (It makes one wonder what those little follicles are doing up there that cuts their reproduction so tragically short.)

In rare cases the follicles spring to life again and push fresh hair through the skin. But these are rare cases, as I say, and are never the result of ointments and treatments which claim to cure baldness.

Hair transplants, however, work. Indeed, these transplants indicate there's nothing fundamentally wrong with the skin of a bald head. But transplants, in my opinion, leave a bad taste in the soul. I think it's because I see them on certain kinds of people. The other day, for example, I was in the elevator (at city hall of all places) and there was a young man whose scalp was riddled with tiny tussocks of hair. It looked almost natural, when I squinted. All the way to the ground floor the young man talked about real estate.

Baldness is finally a social disease, which brings me again to Elton John. He is one who could stand up for baldness, who could make a moral contribution to this society that has rewarded him so generously for his banana-split music. But has he ever shown his baldness on an album cover or poster? No! Look at him wearing a street-dude beanie as if he were Marvin Gaye. It's disgusting. Coward is the word for someone who could be doing so much to raise the consciousness of the bald and balding.

His example could inspire those of us who count the hairs in our comb, who part our hair discreetly down the middle, who labor each day under the dryer, furiously back-brushing—flipping the temperature from medium to hot—fluffing and ratting the hair to the puff of perfection.

If only Elton would doff his hat and show his skin, walk onstage bared to the soul—then I would forgive him his music and cease to think of him as the Iowa version of the late Elvis Presley.

Dear Matthew Alice:
I'm into leather; not anything kinky, but ordinary things like leather furniture and clothing. I want to know why it costs so much! I understand we're eating more beef than ever. What's happening to all those cow skins?
Lamont Tucker
El Cajon

Leather is expensive for the same reason meat is. It takes much care and feeding to produce a pound of beef, and a square foot of skin comes no cheaper. Also, leather is handled many times before it gets to the store—not only by middlemen and retailers, but by the tanners, the ones who cure the raw skin and make it suitable for working into furniture or clothing. There are no commercial tanners of any size in San Diego County, and so you must buy leather here through middlemen and retailers. The cheapest leather is to be had in Tijuana, but I'm told the quality is sometimes so bad the stuff wouldn't do for a handbag or a sandal.

Me And Roger? We Go Way Back

Richard Louv and Paul Krueger's article on Roger Hedgecock ("Bombs, Babies, and Blindspots," August 25) was so blatantly biased I thought for a moment I was reading the San Diego Union instead of the Reader. The authors seemed intent on slandering Mr. Hedgecock's character through insinuation and half-truth. Further, they managed to ignore Mr. Hedgecock's success in opening up the county bureaucracy to public scrutiny and resisting the traditional special interest, big-money power plays that have been a part of county government for so long.

I have known Roger since he was a bright, enterprising law student working his way through school promoting rock concerts. I scheduled concerts at UCSD at the time and Roger was the first (and only) promoter we dealt with who was honest and had a sense of integrity. Since then I've watched Roger's performance as an aggressive environmentalist attorney, as an effective and innovative city attorney in Del Mar, and now, as a member of the board of supervisors. In all these capacities he has demonstrated a strength of character and a commitment to personal integrity not normally associated with politicians. And make no mistake, Roger is a politician (a fact which seemed to disturb the authors.) One cannot win a supervisorial election or function effectively in the county bureaucracy without possessing that characteristic.

It seems unfortunate to slander one of the few politicians in the region with integrity and a commitment to the public interest. It makes one wonder if the authors had an ulterior motive for this hatchet job.
Thomas C. Shepard

Circular Reasoning

I would personally like to say thanks for the article on "Big Daddy" Roger Hedgecock. I had no idea that he was the San Diego County supervisor who is excluding Southeast San Diego. He seems to have brought some extra color to our colorful political scene, being such an environmentalist and a progressive, media-minded personality. If I lived anywhere from Point Loma to Del Mar or in one of his futuristic apartments, possibly I might benefit from our county supervisor. But alas, my only balm in Gilead is the hope that "Big Daddy" isn't circling my area of San Diego with notions of "going for it," because this area, too, is out of his reach of effectiveness.

I Will Gladly Respond To Any Lies You May Report About Me

I would like to correct several inaccuracies you published last week in an article about Roger Hedgecock.

First, I never ever harassed either Roger Hedgecock or Lou Conde (or anyone else for that matter) in my entire life. If you can cite specific instances whereby I harassed either of them, I would like to know about it and be given an opportunity to respond to whatever misinformation you may uncover.

Second, anyone who has spoken with a sizable number of voters in the third supervisorial district should know that Roger Hedgecock's landslide victory at the polls last November was not due to either Pete Wilson's endorsement or any "impressive television commercials." Almost every uncommitted voter who witnessed or read about my public rape last October went to the polls to vote against Lou Conde without regard to whom his opponent was. Although Lou Conde announced he planned to "slam" Hedgecock, Conde obviously lost sight of whom his opponent was, and "slammed" me instead. The voters merely expressed their opinions about a candidate who viciously stabs his most loyal supporter in the back three weeks before the election.

Please note that Lou Conde is very loose with the term "blackmail." Several weeks ago you reported that Lou Conde publicly called a decision of the Ocean Beach Planning Group "blackmail" during a meeting of the San Diego Regional Coastal Commission. In your issue about Hedgecock, Conde called a fundraiser held last April "blackmail." It is also a matter of public record that Lou Conde went to the district attorney and complained that my offer to help him get re-elected was "blackmail."

I am glad to see that Hedgecock has begun to adopt some of my ideas. Last year, when we were running for supervisor, I was the only candidate who endorsed Proposition 15, the nuclear safeguards initiative. I was also the only candidate who promised to have ordinances enacted to require that all new construction make maximum use of solar energy. It is said that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. But, considering the popularity of my platform, it is no wonder that Roger Hedgecock was so scared when I told him I was going to enter the general election as a write-in candidate, that he had to run to Ed Miller for help.

Sounds Like A Winner

After reading the many letters (four) of criticism concerning the Photography Awards Exhibition, I felt it was time one of the winners stepped forward and addressed the flak. So here I am, one of the winners, ready to take on anybody or thing.

My overall opinion of the whole show was that it was interesting and I liked a number of the photographs. But one thing these "esteemed" critics of art should realize is art is a possibility and should never be confused with fact and reality. Art has nothing to do with "working for a living," "my four-year-old son," or "the good old American public." What these people should realize is art is an image/nonimage existing in our minds, not in words.

What all this one-sided criticism of six winners comes down to is a basic case of hard-core sour grapes by a group of people who "don't understand art."

She Read It In A Magazine

Regarding Christopher, the haircutting man's ad, page 11, August 18: I think the attitude shown in the ad is neither chauvinistic nor offensive. This is a style which can be seen in Vogue, Cosmopolitan, Mademoiselle, and Glamour magazines (sold all over San Diego). Obviously, some of your readers have never opened one of these magazines.

This ad was a refreshing change from the conservative trend in San Diego advertising. It's great that the Reader dares to be different and liberal. I want to see more of this type.

It's a shame that some readers reacted to this ad in the wrong way. Where are the readers' minds at to read so much into that ad? Come on San Diego readers, enlighten up!

Closing Strains

Although your readers are probably tired of hearing about the India Street Jazz vs. Will Boulet controversy, I feel it my duty to set the record straight and perhaps shed a little light on this unfortunate mess.

As co-owner of Piktor's restaurant on India Street, and having dabbled in music before in both Detroit and Denver, when the first meeting was called about the 1976 festival in early June of that year I volunteered to be the chairman and organizer. Shortly after the first meeting I was introduced to Will Boulet. He was my first and, at that time, only link with the San Diego jazz scene. He said he had been running the stage (setting up equipment, etc.) at the Catamaran (I didn't bother to verify), and I told him of my plans to get as many San Diego groups as possible. He said he could move them on and off the stage very quickly, so I decided to give him that job.

At the end of the festival Boulet broke off all relations with us and wasn't heard from again. That is, until this year's festival. Although invited to the first meeting this year, he never showed up and then started claiming we were interfering with his summer jazz series. He then began a campaign to subvert the India Street Jazz Festival by any and all means at his disposal.

The India Street Jazz Festival is more of an annual party we throw than anything else, and has no pretenses of becoming a major vehicle for jazz in this town. And so it is not for us that I write. It is rather for the jazz musicians themselves (25 of whom lost work due to Boulet's handiwork), the jazz lovers of San Diego (who ended up getting two rather mediocre jazz series because of this nonsense), and the future of jazz in San Diego (surely to suffer if it has a Will Boulet or any of his type at the helm).

It is so sad that time and time again between the artist who just wants to show his stuff and the public who is hungry to share it, there always stands a broker who, for his own personal goals, ends up royally screwing both.

Nuclear power. I worry about what's going to happen if a lot of countries get into war. It's spreading out...even the little countries have nuclear power now. The big countries are selling it to them. I'm afraid of mass destruction, not immediately, but in the future. The U.S. is going to be right in the middle of it, whether we get burned or not. I'm afraid for people. I'm also afraid of people, people I can't understand, who I have to run into every day. Some of them are threatening to me.

I'm really afraid of being lost, of going somewhere and then getting lost. It's a horrible feeling, not knowing where I am. It's weird. Everything just stops for a second. I start wondering how am I going to get out of this. I tell myself I'm an intelligent, sensible person. Usually I'm in my car. I go through a whole procedure, stop the car, get out the map, look for street signs. That and big spiders, anything larger than a quarter. Anything smaller than that I can handle, but with big spiders I go berserk.

I'm into metaphysical science, and the thing that scares me most is falling in my evolution...not following through with the thing I was meant to do when I was placed on this earth. It doesn't exactly scare me, because I know I'm not going to fall. I'm not scared of anything else anymore. I used to be scared of things like police officers, or not getting high enough grades in school, or my job. But I've more or less balanced myself out now.

Irrational things that can't be controlled by society, people who do things with no logical base for their actions...like Son of Sam. We don't understand those things, and the basis of fear is fear of the unknown. Certain political acts in the world. Things that people do that are really crazy. With Son of Sam the whole city of New York was in a state of fear. I could be driving down the street and get shot by a sniper. There are a lot of crazy people, and we could be interacting with them and never know it.

The nightmare situation. It's really a scary thing. You wake up after a nightmare with this after effect...like a movement from the subconcious to the conscious, the twilight zone kind of thing. You're not sure you're awake or still dreaming. Then you're not even sure what it was that scared you, you've forgotten. But the feeling's still there, more of a general sensation. That's a real raw fear experience.

JOHN SPAGNOLA

See You In Church

Reverend John Spagnola talks a lot about finishing up business here in San Diego and returning to Hollywood, where he works as a public affairs officer for the national Church of Scientology. But if the San Diego Union and Spagnola don't agree to a truce, the 26-year-old former family counselor might as well rent an apartment next to the local church's Ninth and C Street headquarters and dig in for an extended battle.

Spagnola and the editors of the Union have already engaged in a series of personal confrontations. Three weeks ago the church filed a $10,000 lawsuit against the paper for invasion of privacy, and the Union returned the favor with three sizable articles on the controversial religious sect. The latest story, which appeared last Monday, detailed the national church's lawsuits against newspapers and government officials across the country. It followed two stories which ran on August 21. Both were written by Union reporter Leigh Fenly, who enrolled in an introductory course at the church without identifying herself as a reporter.

When local church officials learned of Fenly's connection with the Union, they put in a call to Hollywood headquarters, and Spagnola was dispatched to lead a battle of nerves with the Union. Spagnola's first move was to ask Union associate editor Peter Kaye to halt publication of the original Fenly story. In return, he promised to try to convince the local parishioners to drop their privacy suit. Spagnola and Kaye disagree on many of the details of those initial meetings. The two do agree that Kaye got so mad at the suggestion of such a trade-off that he almost bodily removed Spagnola from the paper's editorial offices.

Since his first confrontations with Kaye, Spagnola, who previously worked at the church's Miami office, has been trying to build public sympathy for the organization. In the past week, Spagnola has been circulating a simple, three-sentence petition to clergymen throughout the city. Making indirect reference to the Fenly story, Spagnola's petition calls for an end to "spying or deceitfully obtaining membership in a religious organization." Spagnola claims to have some 30 signatures, including those of rebel Catholic priest Neil Voight, and Rabbi Morton Cohn.

Spagnola claims the Union is apprehensive about the petitions. "They're trying to poison the area. They want to build a defense against our lawsuit and discredit the petitions." Kaye calls Spagnola's claims "totally unbelievable," and says the latest article was written only to point out similar harassment of other newspapers by the church. Kaye also reiterated that reporters often "go undercover" to get first-hand stories.

The war of nerves has brought the church a segment on Channel 10's nightly news ("We were very happy with their broadcast," says Spagnola), and neither side plans to back off. Spagnola, who, like all members of the church, receives a salary based on a percentage of the sales of textbooks and courses, hasn't decided when to release his petitions to the media. He promises the list of sympathizers will be made public, but voices concern about using the format of a press conference. "Those things are roast city; they put you on the defensive immediately. And the Union, which seems to have more reporters than we have members, will attack me throughout the whole thing." Union editor Kaye is poised to assign a writer to cover the petition story. "I guess this thing isn't hurting either of us," he mused. "In fact, they probably have more people down there trying to take their courses because of all this controversy."

All Undressed And No Place To Go

The owners of several adult movie houses may soon find themselves in the unusual position of having lots of money to spend and no one to spend it on. Two weeks ago the Union-Tribune, which, for more than one and a half years, opened its pages to X-rated movie advertising, announced that it was once again tightening up its policy. The U-T followed the lead of the New York Times and the three McClatchy-owned papers (the Sacramento, Fresno and Modesto Bees), and told theater owners that only the movie title, show times and addresses of their adult showhouses will be allowed in their ads. In rapid succession came similar statements by the Valley News (a suburban Los Angeles paper owned by the Chicago Tribune), the L.A. Times, the Long Beach Independent Press-Telegram, and the Seattle Times.

The L.A. Times, which reportedly makes over $1 million a year on such advertising, went a step further than the others by refusing to print even the title and showtime information. Los Angeles adult theater owners had no warning of the policy switch. They read about it, along with one million other subscribers, in the paper's September 23 edition. Jim Johnson, advertising director for the huge L.A.-based Pussycat Theater chain (more than $250,000 in advertising with the Times last year), says Times publisher Otis Chandler bowed in part to pressure from the Tidings (the Los Angeles Catholic weekly), the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce, and KABC television, which ran several editorials urging the paper to cease publication of the ads.

Johnson and Bob Woodford, manager of the Academy, Fine Arts, and Guild theaters here in San Diego, both hope to direct more of their ad dollars to radio and television. KCBQ, KGB, KFMB, B-100 and Magic 91 have previously accepted their spots, and Woodford has used Channel 8. Woodford had at one time been able to run his ads on KSON, Dan McKinnon's country-western radio station, but McKinnon has since changed his policy. "I don't quite understand why the country-western stations won't take the ads," says Woodford. "Those songs are about the same thing as my movies."

McKinnon's change of heart, and the new policies adopted by the newspapers prompted other local stations to draw up some strict guidelines in anticipation of the rush for airtime. Rick Leibert of KGB radio says his program directors will be scrutinizing ad copy for anything that gets "out of bounds sex- or violence-wise." Leibert also plans to restrict the spots to the evening hours and is drawing up a formula to limit the number of ads aired per hour. Paul Palmer, general manager of KFMB and B-100, went even further when he announced Monday that his stations will accept no advertising at all for the adult movies. Palmer's sister station, Channel 8 television, will continue to show the ads after 11 p.m., but will limit content to the film's title, showtimes, and theater address. The station also plans to limit the number of ads shown in any given week.

Jud Yalkut, one of America's most respected video artists, has earned his reputation by means of his imaginative, sometimes unsettling manipulation of this most common, familiar technology. Where millions of Americans experience television with numbing regularity and few expectations, Yalkut has moved far beyond the popular conception of the medium's potential.

His video installation at the Grossmont College Gallery, entitled "Clairvideo" incorporates a general theme—the movement of the Mevlevi Whirling Dervishes, and repeats and distorts the motion by way of a series of video monitors. A central monitor, mounted on a pedestal, twirls about while its screen is illuminated by the image of a spinning Whirling Dervish. Encircling the central monitor are eight additional monitors whose screens carry a similar image (reprogrammed through an analog computer). The distorted image, in turn, moves around the circle of monitors.

Yalkut, in an accompanying display, has recreated the TV living room of a middle-class family, circa 1948. Complete with deco furniture and a 1948 Philco, the installation is detail perfect with one exception: the 1948 black-and-white Philco tube has been replaced with a Sony Trinitron color tube on which Yalkut beams a continuous series of his experimental tapes.

The Yalkut displays will be open for viewing at the Grossmont College Gallery, 8800 Grossmont College Drive, El Cajon, Monday through Wednesday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. and 6-9 p.m.; Thursdays 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.; Fridays 10 a.m. to 3 p.m.; and Sundays noon to 4 p.m. The exhibit runs through September 11. IT APPEARS SUDDENLY as you pass the final row of cottages, leaving the small Normandy town of Pontorson, in France. Rising majestically out of the shoreline mists, Le Mont St. Michel's silhouette betrays the sharp, Gothic spires of its hilltop abbey, the rolling softness of lush vegetation, and the steep rake of walls that have shielded this island-city from threatening hordes and twice-daily tides for more than 700 years.

This weekend, San Diegans will have an opportunity to view a much more vulnerable replica of the 13th century ocean fortress when Norman Richard Kraus and his crew construct a sandcastle model of Le Mont St. Michel on the beach at Del Mar.

In contrast to the impromptu nature of most sandcastle projects, and their predictably less-than-artistic results, Kraus's group, Sandcastle Construction, Ltd., will realize a well-planned structure standing over 16 feet high, spanning 40 feet across, and utilizing 400 tons of beach sand. The crew will be providing instruction on the finer points of sand sculpting throughout the construction.

The scale of this grainy Mont St. Michel is such that it will take the entire three-day weekend to complete: on Saturday, September 3, bulldozers and hydraulic pumps will be moving sand and water; Sunday, September 4, will be devoted to reproducing the town below the abbey; and on Monday, September 5, work will be concentrated on the re-creation of the famous abbey itself, all of which will be visible on the beach north of 29th Street, in Del Mar. For more information, call 481-0942.

DANNY MILLSAP

Sports

AT FIRST IT DOESN'T MAKE MUCH SENSE. A man who has pitched softball for 50 years, and who has to his credit a string of 88 consecutive scoreless innings (1960) and a no-hitter (1968), will take the mound this weekend with one objective: to pitch to a lot of batters and give up a lot of home runs.

Then you find out that when Danny Millsap pitches this Sunday he will be doing so as part of the "Muscular Dystrophy Celebrity Softball Marathon," and that not only do the batters have to pay one dollar to participate in the marathon, but Millsap himself will donate the same for every ball hit fairly over the fence.

Millsap, a local sports promoter who estimates he has pitched over 5,000 games in his softball career, will toss continuously until an accompanying physician decides he has gone far enough. By that time, Millsap hopes, he will have accomplished two things: 1) the collection of a sizeable amount of money for MD and 2) a new record for consecutive innings pitched (more than 27).

It is being called a "celebrity" marathon because Millsap will be assisted in his efforts by former Kearny High School athlete Harold Greene, who, when he is not taking cuts at the plate or scooping up ground balls, is the anchorman for a local news team. Greene, it is hoped, will be joined by a host of other invitees, mostly from the local media.

Additional incentive for participating in this event will take the form of a free "Slurpee" for each paying batter, and a free taco, tamale, or soft drink, courtesy of the Old Town Tamale Factory, for anyone who hits a double off the generous Millsap.

The "Muscular Dystrophy Celebrity Softball Marathon," in which anyone willing to pay can participate, will take place Sunday, September 4, starting at noon, at the Presidio baseball park, at the foot of Presidio Park. For additional information, call 262-0769.

DRAWING BY DAVID HIRSCH

IT IS GENERALLY ASSUMED that flamenco is a typical example of Spanish dancing. In truth, this dance form of the Spanish gypsies, with its colorfully costumed participants, alluring movements, stamping of the feet (zapateado), and clapping of the hands (palmada), is much more showy and provocative than classical Spanish dance.

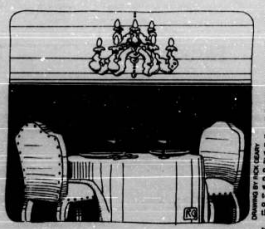
What the two forms do have in common is that emotional fire particular to the Spanish (some believe the word flamenco is a derivative of the Spanish word flama, for flame). Another feature that they share is dancer Teodoro Morca, who together with his wife Isabel will combine Spanish ballet and flamenco in a concert this week in San Diego.

Morca, who has been called the "Jascha Heifetz of dance," is a highly respected teacher and lecturer on Spanish dance. But he is better known as a performer who has danced all over the world from gypsy caves to Las Vegas hotels. Isabel, on the other hand, has appeared on the stage and television as an actress, concert pianist, organist, and dancer.

Together, they will perform a program entitled "Flamenco in Concert," Wednesday, September 7, at 8 p.m., in the Dramatic Arts Building Theatre, San Diego State University. Additional information can be obtained by calling 286-5204.

For A Few Dollars Less

ELEANOR WIDMER



The Restaurant: Christian's Danish Inn
Type of Food: Gourmet International, with emphasis on Danish
The Location: 8235 University Avenue, La Mesa (465-8800)
Price Range: Fixed price of $15 per person
Closed Sunday and Monday. Dinners only, 6 p.m.-9 p.m.

Indulge me in the utopian fantasy that I would be allowed to charge one aspect of dining throughout the city which did not merely relate to upgrading the quality of the food. What would it be? Do I hear cries of better service, or later hours? San Diego is notorious for shutting its dining rooms at an hour when business starts to boom in other cities. It would be nice if there were more after-hour places that served first-rate food. Are you expecting me to ask for greater variety in restaurants? There is a crying need in San Diego for a cafe that serves only desserts, from cheese to zabaglione. Actually, my wish is very commonplace, not to mention materialistic. I'd like to eat three dollars from the price of most dinners in town.

Why three dollars? First, because as Freud has noted, three is a magical number. Second, because I want to be fair. Restaurateurs, after all, are entitled to make reasonable profits. But any dinner which would cost me three dollars less would make me less angry psychologically. If I have a bad two-dollar meal, I shrug my shoulders. If I have a bad five-dollar meal, I begin to get irate. Any meal over ten dollars makes me a bit edgy, and I begin to equate it with what I could produce for that amount of money at home. As for $15, that's an amount I can tolerate but once a year. Which is not to say that Christian's, the gourmet dining place in La Mesa, should be ignored. To the contrary, you should know of its existence. But at that price, it's not a place that would come to mind after a hard day when you don't even want to fuss with a hamburger.

If you phone and ask to be placed on the mailing list, which you should do just for the fun of reading their menus, you will be sent the evening entrees for two months in advance. Only one entree is served each night. You select the entree you like, then phone for reservations. Christian's relies heavily on ritual. People are seated 15 minutes after they arrive because they are served sherry or champagne free. If you come late, you run the risk of not having sufficient time to savor your drink, or worse, of jamming the lobby which is, in fact, a living room. The whole concept behind Christian's is that you are an honored guest in a private home.

So we've arrived on time, exactly at seven p.m. We are greeted by Mrs. Hansen, the owner, and she offers us our drink. This is to be sipped slowly. Though we have penciled into the dining room and only one other couple is there, we can't be seated immediately. Artists demand the muse; Christian's demands the civility of sipping sherry for a quarter of an hour. That done, we are ushered into the dining room. It's lovely, very elegant with blue wallpaper, two chandeliers, exquisite china and silverware. In our room there are no more than three tables and the large one is not filled until we are almost through with our meal.

The couple opposite are young. They have refused the free wines as they do not drink. She wears an off-the-shoulder white gown, but scarcely removes her gaze from her companion. He oh's and ah's appropriately for each course, and it can be deduced that he hardly eats this much or this expensively often. The meal is huge: appetizer, soup, salad, entree with three vegetables, dessert, and beverage.

During our stay in the dining room, we have been presented with a hand-printed menu which we study carefully. The waitress then repeats the evening's offerings, one course at a time. For appetizers we have a choice of homemade pate, or pickled herring, or melon with Blackforest ham, or Danish-style cucumbers (with oil and vinegar). I select melon and ham, my friend has pate. They are both excellent. The pate, made with whipping cream, is especially fine. My melon appears at its peak, and the Westphalian or German ham has a gorgeous smokiness that's superior to prosciutto, or Italian ham.

The next course is split pea soup. It, too, tastes very good, any only objection is that it's served with oysterettes—a minor gaucherie in an elegant dining hall. Each course is wheeled in by the chef/owner, Mr. Hansen, and presented with continental gallantry. We ask to have our salads after the entree, so our lobster thermidor comes after the soup.

Lobster thermidor is always tricky because it's so rich. It's prepared with a cream and wine sauce, and since lobster is rich to start with, each forkful will stick to the roof of the mouth as if it were a butterball.

I would say that the lobster thermidor is good, but not superb—the sauce does not send one into ecstasies. The vegetables are magnificent, and three are served: broccoli, grated zucchini au gratin, and duchesse potatoes (puffs that have been fried like beignets). With the entree we have homemade, freshly baked bread.

The salad proves the most disappointing item on the menu as it, too, has a cream dressing. The waitress apologizes when we complain, saying that it should be served before the entree. But before or after, the fact remains that split pea soup is heavy, lobster is heavy and creamy, and a creamy salad, and sweetened at that, simply does not create enough contrast nor cleanse the mouth.

For dessert we have a choice of freshly prepared chocolate mousse pie, cassata siciliana cake, or pineapple in kirsch. I have the mousse pie. It arrives frozen and exquisite except for the fact that it is studded with dots of frozen whipped topping. Either the pie has to be served without a topping, or with a dollop of fresh whipped cream. The cassata cske rates high marks. It's made from layers of yellow cake with diced candied fruit and cream in between, the whole covered with chocolate frosting.

If you're salivating reading this, you should; eating at Christian's is quite an experience. When the large table was filled, we heard bits of conversation about research at Yale and Stanford, and it brought to mind the line in the menu which reads: "An animal feeds, a man eats ... but only a man of culture dines."

Christian's is intended not merely for those who have money, because there are many high rollers who spend equivalent amounts at garish places in Mission Valley, but for those who pride themselves on a "cultivated" attitude toward dining. Cultivated, it is. Impeccable in service, attentiveness, atmosphere, it is. But there remain a few wrinkles to the menu we sampled: split pea soup with lobster is not a good combination, nor is a salad with a cream dressing. As we left, we spoke to Mrs. Hansen about the salad and the frozen "cream" on the pie. She looked very concerned and said, "Do you both teach cooking?"

The Hansens do not require cooking lessons. They are both excellent cooks and their monthly menus offer tantalizing selections of veal, beef, lamb and poultry. However, the night we were there we could have used some balance between heavy and light dishes. And, as I started to say at the beginning of this article, at $12 per person, instead of $15, I would have felt more pleased with the total dining experience. ☐

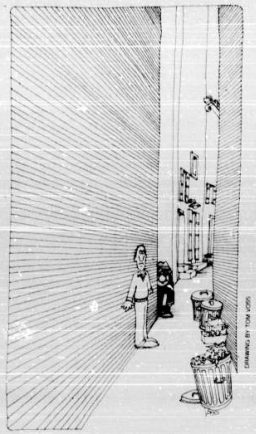
Confessions of a Discaholic

JONATHAN SAVILLE



Of collecting many records, as the Preacher might have said, there is no end. But it is really the beginning of the addiction that presents the greatest hurdle. Let us suppose you want to have Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade around the house, to wallow in when the mood strikes you. There are 23 different recordings of this work currently in the domestic catalog, along with a number of others available from importers and through mail order. The conductors include Ansermet, Beecham, Bernstein, Dorati, Goossens, Hanink, von Karajan, Mehta, Monteux, Ormandy, Ozawa, Perlea, Previn, Rossi, Rostropovich, Scherchen, Semkow, Stokowski, and Svetlanov, conducting everything from the Berlin Philharmonic to the St. Louis Symphony. How can you possible decide which one you want?

The easiest—and worst—way is to trundle into The Turntable, a local Wherehouse, or Tower Records, flip through the Rimsky bin, and buy the record that at that moment somehow makes you feel "This is it!" Your choice in this case is not a musical one at all: you are simply expressing your taste in cover art. The cover artists seem to have vied with each other in the concoction of stylized oriental ladies with fernants of prodigious size, wenches who apparently are inveigling the growly Shah as much with their pneumatic equipment as with their story-telling ability. Gorgeous, if you go for that sort of thing. But five or six dollars is a lot to pay for cover, however titillating; after all, you are presumably going to be listening to your purchase a lot more than looking at it.

You might, if you are really serious about getting the very best, go to the library and consult back issues of the record review journals—High Fidelity, Gramophone, and (scraping the bottom of the barrel) Stereo Review. The trouble with the reviews you will find there is that they are (understandably) devoted to the latest recordings. Even when the reviewers mention recordings other than the one they are reviewing, they tend to concentrate on those of the past two or three years—the current competition, so to speak. It is not very often that the review will let you know that the best recording—in sound as well as in interpretation—is an old mono from 1953, still available if you know how to look for it. The record industry would like us to feel that newest is best, and newer and younger artists certainly deserve a chance to be heard and to earn royalties, but the truth is that, in regard to a majority of the standard pieces of classical music, the most satisfying recording—for whatever your individual taste might be—was probably made ten or 20 years ago, and that recording has by now been around so long that the reviews don't even bother to mention it. Even those listeners who demand the utmost in sonic realism or sonic lushness (two rather different things, by the way) will make a great error if they suppose that a record from 1977 is necessarily higher in its fidelity than one made in 1960. There have been no real technical advances in sound reproduction since that time (except, perhaps, for quadraphonics), and there is no reason to suppose that the tastes and abilities of recording engineers have dramatically improved over the years: a good engineer, with good equipment and a good hall, could make as fine-sounding a recording two decades ago as he can now.

You can, of course, pursue your Scheherazade inquiries backwards into the archives, consulting all the past issues of the record magazines, year by year (High Fidelity's reviews are conveniently republished in annual volumes, with an index to make your research easier). If you can wait until you hear a recording you like on one of the classical radio stations—but that may take years, and even then you can't be sure that there isn't a performance you would love twice as much, sitting there on the station's shelves and gathering dust because the programmer has been arbitrarily ignoring it. Or you can listen to a friend's recording, which will often sound much better than it really is because you are enjoying yourself at his house, with nice company, pleasant intoxicants, and other muddlers of critical judgment. Or you can ask me—and I will tell you with absolute conviction (in spite of having heard only a quarter of the available recordings) that there has never been a Scheherazade to compare with Fritz Reiner's with the Chicago Symphony, a recording that gives this grand old war-horse new life in a manner absolutely no one else can match—except for Pierre Monteux in his unbeatable early recording with the San Francisco Symphony, mono, deleted, virtually impossible to come by, and one of the treasures of my private collection. (That is the way collectors talk—and it really isn't much of a help, is it?)

Most music lovers will be content with a single recording of Scheherazade. It is a marvelous piece of music, in its own special genre, but it is not the sort of work that demands (or allows for) an enormous range of interpretation; a great performance of it, such as Reiner's or Monteux's, will reveal practically everything the score has to offer, and if there are other recordings equally good, they will not differ appreciably from these or from one another—or, at least, the differences will not be crucial. It is quite another case with a work like Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, for example. Here, the work is so rich in potential that no performance, however perfect in itself, can do it full justice. There are countless choices in matters of tempo, phrasing, articulation, and balance, all of which are justified by the score, while none of them is dictated by it; hence, all sorts of "correct" interpretations are possible, and it is the nature of music of this quality that many of these interpretations will differ radically from one another, while all remaining faithful to what Beethoven wrote. What counts is the wholeness, harmony, and radiance of each individual interpretation, the conductor's vision, his power of taking the notes on the page, with all their possibilities and all their ambiguities, and making a living, expressive, coherent piece of music out of them.

Thus, while one might reasonably speak of the "best" recording of Scheherazade (and even there the notion of "best" is disputable), it is impossible for there to be an ideal recording of the Pastoral. Any single recording, even if it is overwhelmingly persuasive, can only tell part of the story; consequently no matter what recording you choose you are wrong. It is at this point that the casual record-buyer and the born-again collector part company. At a very minimum, the collector will have to have Toscanini's Pastoral, Furtwangler's Pastoral, and Walter's Pastoral, all of them superb and each of them startlingly original in its approach. And then, if it comes down to it, can one really do without Monteux's Pastoral, so warm, so clear, so vital—especially since it is on a budget label? And Szell's Pastoral, so precise, so disciplined, so intense? And Klemperer's—so expansive so mellow, so heartfelt? And Boehm's—so radiant, so tender? And then, which Toscanini recording is the one to have? The 1937 with the BBC Symphony (Seraphim)? Or the 1952 with the NBC Symphony (Victrola)? Or the 1939 radio check from the Arturo Toscanini Society (now on Olympic, if you can get it), congested in sound but interpretively unequalled in many important details? If you want to understand the Pastoral, in its fullness and variety, you obviously have to have all three of these, for each is in a certain sense a "definitive" recording by one of this century's very greatest conductors; and the same thing must be said about Bruno Walter's recordings of the Pastoral with the Columbia Symphony (Odyssey) and the Vienna Philharmonic (Turnabout), or about Furtwangler's recordings with the Vienna Philharmonic (Da Capo import) and the RAI Orchestra (Olympic). This is not even to mention the likelihood that one of the younger conductors will come out tomorrow with a recording of the Pastoral as good as any of the others, and sufficiently different from them to make it imperative that you add this new interpretation to your collection. Carlos Kleiber's Pastoral, or Daniel Barenboim's, or James Levine's, or Michael Tilson Thomas's, or Alain Lombard's. And so there you are in that endless chute, the sliding-pond of multiple recordings, from which the dollars drop in a ceaseless green rain.

If multiple recordings of such things as Beethoven symphonies or Mozart concertos are the bane (and the joy) of the serious record collector, the challenges these records pose—money, space, and the time to listen to them—are as nothing compared to the dilemma of opera recordings. There may be no ideal recording of the Mozart D Minor Piano Concerto, but there are ideal orchestras, and ideal conductors, and ideal pianists, and it is not so rare an event when three such ideals get together to record. But operas require so large a personnel, and the degree of competence of opera singers varies so enormously, that it simply never happens that a recording of a complete opera will be the "best"—or even adequate—in every element without exception: orchestra, chorus, conducting, and all the soloists. The usual case is that one recording will have a superb soprano, a decent tenor, and a monstrous croaker of a baritone; another recording of the same opera will be tops in the baritone department, but the soprano will be a whooping, webbing, screaming hoidover from a noble career that should have ended ten years before; or all the singers will be competent second-raters, while the conductor has gotten a fire and a fury into the score that no one has come close to before or since. If you love the opera and want to hear it at its best, you need the first recording for the soprano, the second for the baritone, and the third for the conductor—and where, after all, are you going to find room for all those fat boxes of Verdi or Wagner, all those flawed Carmens and Normas and Figaros and Rosenkavaliers?

But even if there were opera recordings in which every member of the cast was a Flagstad or a Bjoerling, the serious collector would still find himself acquiring more than a single recording of his favorite operas. Conductors differ from each other, sometimes radically, so do orchestras; so do pianists, violinists, horn players; but none of these differences is of the same order of magnitude as the difference between any two singers. Artur Rubinstein and Vladimir Horowitz are about as unlike in their approach to—for example—Chopin as two musicians could possibly be; but they both play the piano (indeed, they both play Steinways). In contrast, Maria Callas and Renata Tebaldi not only differ as musicians—in their mastery of technique, their interpretations of the score, their dramatic sensibilities—but they also "play" different instruments, for there is nothing in musical performance as unique as the human voice. If these two ladies sang exactly alike (in fact, they differ in all respects), there would still be that basic difference in the sound of the two voices, a difference all lovers of singing must cherish, because each voice produces its own kind of thrills and no substitute will ever move us in quite the same way.

Hence, those who feel passionately about La Boheme (and who does not?) will have to have the Angel recording with Callas and Di Stefano, and the London recording with Tebaldi and Bergonzi, and the Seraphim recording with De los Angeles, Bjoerling, Merrill, and Beecham, and the Victrola with Licia Albanese, Jan Peerce, and a very audible Toscanini, and the old Seraphim with Gigli and the London with Pavarotti, and the Cetra with Tagliavini—and all this just as a start. As in the case of orchestral and instrumental works, the collecting of opera records is complicated by the fact that the major artists have often recorded the same work more than once it, their careers—and for a singer the development or decline of the voice between recordings, as well as the differing circumstances of each performance (whom one is singing with, whether it is raining that day, how the divorce is going) make for far more striking differences between one recording and another than one finds in even the most erratic conductors or instrumentalists. Callas recorded Tosca twice, and although the earlier recording (with Di Stefano and De Sabata) is by far the better, there are still things to be said for the later one. Tebaldi's mono Madama Butterfly on Richmond and her stereo remake on London are both fine—the Richmond fresher, the London more profound—and both Puccini-lovers and Tebaldi-lovers would be hard put to choose between them. Furthermore, the true collector (which is to say the collector whose appetite knows no bounds and whose bank balance never runs dry) must take into account the thriving (if illegal) industry in private and pirated recordings of operas, usually taped from live radio broadcasts, and hence embodying unique moments in the artists' interpretations of their roles, with all the spontaneity and excitement of stage performances, along with all the mistakes, the footfalls, the audience noises, and the hoarse shouts of the prompter. Once you start on this road, you are lost forever; for the path to bankruptcy is paved with pirated opera recordings, they are as many as the stars in the sky, and for the fanatical follower of one singer or another each is a precious document which he will seek out with relentless zeal, and for which he is willing to pay the most outrageous prices. It is not enough to have Maria Callas's commercially available studio recording of La Traviata (once on Cetra, now on Turnabout), one must also have the 1955 Callas-Di Stefano-Giulini performance from La Scala, and the 1952 Callas-Di Stefano-Mugnai performance from Mexico City, and the legendary 1954 Callas-Bjoerling-Bernstein performance from Reykjavik. And who knows what other performances may suddenly surface in that dark underground record store in Westwood or Greenwich Village, where little men in greasy suits sidle up to you to peddle the latest Callas pirate, like pushers selling dope?

There are some classical LPs that have been uninterruptedly in the catalog for 25 years—the Toscanini Beethoven symphonies, for example. But the lifetime of most issues is much shorter than that, and it is common for many recordings—particularly those of music for which the audience is small—to spend only a year or two in the catalog and the record stores before being deleted. It is this phenomenon that desperately draws classical record buying into the infernal circle where those afflicted with authentic collection mania spend eternity trying to fill a bottomless cistern with grains of sand. There is no real collectorship without rarities: the out-of-print book, the special brief issue of the commemorative stamp, the porcelain birdie that the Oberammergau artisan produced for only 14 months before switching to ashtrays. Deleted records are the rarities of record collecting, and their prices dwell in the same lofty regions of unreason as those of first editions of Dickens and Paul Revere teapots. There is a small but assiduous tribe of entrepreneurs around the country who accumulate and market these items, always at a considerable markup over the original cost. The collector soon comes to know them all: Fred Steinmetz in Mississippi, Long Island; Leslie Gerber in Woodstock, New York; David Harvey in Radnor, Pennsylvania; Ed Durbeck in our own Leucadia (continued on page 35)

Stinis's skytypers usually cover San Diego's beaches every other weekend, but this city certainly hasn't seen stunts like the one he did over Griffith Park, when he worked for a self-proclaimed aerial artist.

East Coast skytyping, but the whole operation is small potatoes compared to skywriting's heyday in the 1930s.

Right from its inception, skywriting boomed. First, man invented the plane; then he used it for war; then his thoughts turned to advertising with it. In fact, popular accounts agree that World War I smoke screens inspired a British air force major to take commercialism to the skies; the major, one John C. Savage, reportedly made skywriting history in 1922 when he puffed out an ad for the Daily Mail newspaper in the azure expanse over Epsom Downs Racetrack.

The American appetite for marketing madness soon gobbled up the aerial gimmick, and a few months later a World Series crowd at the New York Polo Grounds mouthed the words as a message billowed out above them. The pilot fretted about running out of smoke after his fourth letter and enraging his conservative onlookers, but the smoke supply held out long enough for him to inscribe "Hello USA ... Call Vanderbilt 7200."

Thousands of people took the high-flown advice. By the end of 1927, the Skywriting Corporation of America had visited every major American city, from San Diego to Bangor, Maine. The company boasted a fleet of SE-5As, seven pilots, a 20-man ground crew, and five bases throughout the country. By the late 1920s, aerial attractions had trended toward the exotic. One outfit, called the "Voice of the Sky," promised clients it could cover every square mile of a given territory and could shower a mixture of amplified commercial messages and popular music upon the hapless groundlings. During the first few months of operation, Voice of the Sky planes rained tobacco company ads upon an estimated 1.3 million people. About the same time, the "Flying Signboard" company tickled night audiences with another offbeat medium: motor-powered neon messages mounted on the wing bottoms of tri-motor planes.

The appeal of the smoke-writing had the most permanence, however, and big orders rolled in from the beginning. By the end of its first year in business, Skywriting Corporation of America had racked up more than a million dollars in contracts, including commissions from flirtier Lil Fox, the American Tobacco Company, and Pepsi Cola. Pepsi later paid for the biggest skywriting campaign in history during the 1930s, a multi-million dollar promotion in the course of which Andy Stinis (one of Skywriting Corporation of America's principals) spelled out the word "Pepsi" 7,000 times. "That was the height of skywriting," Greg Stinis mourns today. "From that point on, it was all downhill."

The advent of the Second World War started the decline, and the birth of television accelerated it. Companies which had been pouring their advertising dollars into the air rechanneled them onto the airwaves, and most skywriters packed up their smoke machines forever.

The Skywriting Corporation of America managed to hang on, however, and was around to ride a minor skywriting renaissance in the 1960s, when the early glow of TV began to fade. Although Andy Stinis had invented skytyping in 1949, the process wasn't streamlined until the mid-1960s, and Greg says business now is modest but stable.

Of course, writing and typing in smoke aren't the only forms of aerial advertising to be found today. One cousin, banner towing, seems to be growing in San Diego. An El Cajon company, the Golden State Flying Club, has been towing messages all over the county for six years, and at least two other flying services have begun to offer more recent competition. Banner towing is just a sideline for all the local companies, but Golden State says it's now doing about $10,000 a year in business, which includes both personal and commercial messages.

Banners offer two distinct advantages, argues Steve Mason, one of the Golden State partners. "First, you can fly them in a wider range of weather. You don't have to have blue skies. Secondly, our main niche is that we're a lot less expensive. People call me up all the time and ask me about smokewriting, and I'll tell them about Stinis up the coast. They'll get his price and then ten minutes later they're calling me back, saying they'd better stick with the banners."

All three banner companies charge about the same: $145 for the first hour and $100 to $120 for each hour after that. (Stinis's price, in contrast, starts at $500 per message and escalates from there.) To avoid dragging the banner over the ground, two planes fly down low enough to hook a rope tied to the assembled message, then hoist the gaudy package into the air. The planes fly at 1,000 feet, as low as the Federal Aviation Administration regulations will permit, in order for the five-foot letters to be best seen.

That's their fatal flaw, counters Stinis, who also tows banners now and then: you have to be within close range to read them. When Stinis contrasts them with the dimensions of skytyped letters, an irrepressible gleam lights his eyes. "Each skytyped letter is as tall as the Empire State Building, and most messages are about five miles long. When we put them up at 10,000 feet, you can see them for 20 miles in each direction! A that altitude, we figure you're reaching two million people with a four-mile-long billboard. At 15,000 feet, our new altitude, you reach three million!" Skywritten letters are even larger and they've traditionally been more spectacular.

As Stinis uses the terms, "skytyping" requires the five A.T.-6s to fly in a straight-line formation, puffing out little dots of smoke. The combination of dots forms computer-straight letters which march evenly across the vista. In contrast, "skywriting" requires one pilot in a single plane to fly along the lines of each letter. The process is much harder than skytyping, but Stinis still does it, both as a challenge and to preserve a dying art form.

He estimates there can't be more than three or four pilots who skywrite in the entire country, even at the height of its popularity, the business didn't employ many pilots. Aviation oldtimers in San Diego are hard pressed to think of any local fliers who ever tried it, but one veteran is M.A. (Bud) McDonald of the Lindbergh Field manager.

McDonald recalls that he skywrote four or six messages over New York State in the hectic days after World War II. "You have to bear in mind this was a bunch of World War II pilots flying war-weary airplanes, and we got paid a little money, but mostly we were doing it for the hell of it. It was a real Mickey Mouse arrangement."

McDonald says his aerial penmanship never was much good and the hardest part was keeping track of what he'd already put up. His solution: to cross out letter on a diagram as he did them. What you did was write the message on a piece of paper, then you'd write down the headings you'd be flying and what turns you'd have to make. If you flew it right and if you lucked out on your smoke when you were supposed to, it'd come out all right.

Another San Diegan, Rusty Sayers, never did any skywriting himself, but remembers witnessing a particularly historic demonstration of it. That was over Shanghai, China, back in 1936, on Chiang Kai-shek's 50th birthday. Sayers watched his then employer, a former Skywriting Corporation of America flier named Allen Patterson, inscribe the Chinese characters for "long life" over the city. The demonstration was a sly piece of advertising, since Patterson was selling airplanes and Chiang's wife headed the Chinese Nationalist Air Force. The gimmick stopped traffic for miles.

"Patterson hadn't even been able to practice beforehand, or it would have, gotch d, cuzz, but somehow he did it perfectly. There must have been about seven million people in Shanghai at the time, and so at least 1 million must have seen it," Sayers marvels.

Storytelling and skywriting seem to go together, and no one can top Stinis's adventures. The skywriter has had so many he's made up a list to remind himself of the highlights. Off the airfield, Stinis is very approachable, a shocks, tanned man who seems just a touch shy. He

FOR THE FUN OF IT
OH! RIDGE AT BOOM'S

Four talented music makers. Exciting, unique and occasionally insane. They call themselves OH! RIDGE and BOOM'S has got 'em! The best of country, folk rock, the top forties and–as a treat–one of their own originals to spice things up once in a while.

OH! RIDGE–the perfect accompaniment to Boom's new SUPER BOOMER! Now your favorite libation at Boom's is a SUPER BOOMER (also known as a "double" at less sophisticated establishments).

Come see and hear OH! RIDGE every Wednesday through Sunday. 9:00PM 'til 1:00AM.

spends most of his weekdays on the phone, answering endless naive queries about his business, but he still seems freshly enthusiastic about skywriting.

"It's much more exciting than the typing because everything is always different—you're never doing the same pattern twice. But it's also really hard. You can't see a thing you're doing because it's all coming out behind you. You really have to have your wits about you."

He recalls the time that he needed them while putting up "Bugaloo is love" over a San Francisco Navy base. Just as he had finished, Stinis realized Navy gunners were using his o's for target practice. "It just about scared the life out of me!" he says, remembering his hasty retreat.

Another "Bugaloo is love" over Los Angeles contributed to some eerie urban drama. "The 'Bugaloo is' part faded right away, but the air conditions must have changed because the 'love' just hung right up there. Eventually, it floated over to Griffith Park, where some hippies were having a love-in. No one could believe it, but it must have stayed for at least an hour!"

Stinis's skytypers usually cover San Diego's beaches every other weekend, but this city hasn't seen much skywriting. It certainly has never seen any stunts like the one Stinis did over Griffith Park, when he worked for a self-proclaimed aerial artist. The client's idea was for Stinis, to be the paint brush, while the sixth zaniest distinction in what he wanted "painted." Stinis concedes the two did rehearse ahead of time, and the result was 12 cottony airborne astrological signs. On another occasion, a friend of Hugh Hefner commissioned the skywriter to fluff out a gigantic Playboy bunny for Hefner's birthday. Stinis, gamely etched the rabbit silhouette, then got lost in the smoke and misplaced the bunny's eye.

He only ran out of smoke once, while promoting musicians Stilson and Garfunkel. The error occurred because the first letters unexpectedly expanded and the skywriter kept trying to draw larger letters to keep the message even. He ended abruptly with "Simon and Garfunke" but says that drew more attention than the intended lettering.

Though that kind of mistake gives skywriting its romance, the ability to avoid errors is part of what has made skytyping so strong, with the extra speed comes control. While Stinis's skytypers can spit out 12 letters a minute, and easily handle 25 letter signs, Stinis advises clients ordering skywritten words not to go much over five or six letters.

Smoke-producing mechanics for the two processes are identical; both spew out a biodegradable paraffin vapor. In skytyping, however, the center plane transmits an electronic code to the two planes on each side of it. The pilots just fly straight while a machine taps out all the puffs automatically. Stinis says the planes now use a secret code and frequency; public fre-uencies caused some memorable early problems.

He recalls, "We were using a freeway that also controlled model airplanes. So whenever the signal came on we were crashing the models, as well as opening automatic doors and changing street lights. Then we're also a little defensive, we have had people try to upset us. When you're flying over a city, you're always going to have some clown down there who wants to see if he can write his name in the sky. Someone's always going to be out there trying to get you."

At the Long Beach Field, Stinis had exercised the electronic demons and the planes get quick clearance from the tower. The red, white, and blue trim glitters as they climb through the smog. They look like a pack of willful toys. At 9,000 feet, they let out their first test puff and an observer radios back from the ground.

"It's breaking up as fast as you put it out," the radio crackles. Stinis orders ascent to another level.

"That's no good either," the voice barks again.

"We'll try a little higher," Stinis responds. As the AT-6s perform their three-dimensional ballet, their smoke squirts out like shaving cream in the chill, and at 12,000 feet the ground team finally sends reassurance. The visual staccato commences.

Turbulence, not wind, is the constant opponent, according to Stinis. He explains that a steady wind simply moves the letters; he's confronted 50-mile-an-hour blows with no problems. In contrast, confused air masses act like giant aeronautical erasers, and their patterns are very unpredictable. At one extreme, Stinis said he once had to descend in defeat; letters wouldn't hold at any altitude. At the other end of the spectrum, he tells how he once put up a sign for Continental Airlines over Fort Worth only to have it blow, intact, all the way to Dallas. "I had been scheduled to put up a second sign over Dallas, but I just went down and admired the first one!"

With his letters holding, Stinis interrupts "Solarcaine stops sunburn pain" with a personal announcement of his second son's birth. "It's a boy!" the plane announces to greater Los Angeles. Only 400 feet separate the planes' wing tips, the precision flying is the only challenge. Both Stinis and the ex-military pilots who work for him confess to the tedium. "Every once in a while we get to do some fancy flying, and then we can feel like a poor man's Blue Angels. But most of the time it is awfully boring," one said with a sigh.

To Stinis, however, even skywriting's worst boredom is only relative. In exchange for hours spent hours of sunburn out in the sky, he can say with quiet pride that he's the only man in the world doing what he's doing. He flies regularly, he never knows what stars client will call him up next, he's sustaining this peculiar American pop art. If only, he sighs, the ad buyers weren't so blind about skywriting's virtues.

"They think of it strictly as serving the beach crowd. No one has actually done a Neilsen on it," he explains a trifle bitterly. "If they just looked at it logically, on a cost per thousand (subjects exposed to the message) basis, they'd see it makes a lot of sense. Most print media cost you at least $1.50 per thousand. TV is $3 on up. Skywriting, at its most expensive, is only 20 cents per thousand. But when you go to them, they just reach for that little red book and of course they don't find skywriting in it."

When the company moved from New York to Southern California, ten years ago, the Stinises thought they'd found utopia. The pilots could inscribe ads on blue skies all year, and it could turn the business around, they dreamed. Accounts ranging from "Be Up Here - Fly Navy" to "New Price Leader - Toyota" have rolled in, but the nonsummer months remain hungry. Stinis works at it full-time and says he makes enough to support his family, but he certainly would have made much more as an airline pilot. As it is now, he views his future with an uncertain shrug.

Then he unbends. He does have a dream, locked in a briefcase in his office closet. He almost pulled it off a few years ago, then the gas crunch soared him into locking it up again. As he dials the briefcase combination, he reveals his plans as eagerly as a child.

Instead of the toy-like AT-6s, he envisions using Lear jets. Instead of 10,000 or 17,000 feet, he'd fly them at 40,000. "At that altitude, you could have a 70-mile billboard, with 100-mile visibility," he whispers gleefully. "With less turbulence, the signs would hang up there much longer. I could lease the jets for just $600 an hour, so it's economically feasible and we have the electronics to do it."

And he will, Stinis promises. This is not long enough to do inspirations of thinking big. He figures the basic appeal of skywriting hasn't changed. No matter how many times they've watched you before, if you skytype "S-o-l-a-r-c-a-i-n-e," people state openmouthed, as you puff out the "a-i-n-e." "They're compelled to watch. It's like a giant game in the sky," Stinis muses, with a grin. The space-age medium reminds them anew of the inherent delight in creating any message. Language and writing, after all, are fundamentals of humankind, and who can resist the impudence of elevating them to the heavens?

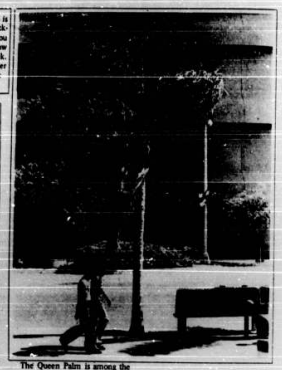
A Frond In Need

Robert Paul

There you are on Sunday afternoon, alone again. You've read your paper; you've listened to your albums. You wander from room to room in search of a meaningful life. Suddenly your eye falls on a bar of Palmolive soap, and a voice within you says: "The African oil palm is the world's greatest source of vegetable oils used in soaps and other articles."

Outside your window, the palm tree you hardly noticed before is waving its fronds...gently...beckoning...Who can explain it? You are taken with the urge to know the palm trees on your block. For your convenience, this paper has prepared an illustrated guide.

The Mexican Fan Palm, also called the Skyduster, is a poor excuse for a shade tree, but it welcome in places where people want a skyline without tall buildings. The California Fan Palm, the state's only native, looks like the Mexican Fan but is shorter and thicker. If left untrimmed, both palms will form a thatch of old leaves from top to bottom.

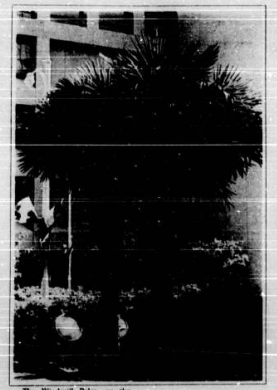


The Queen Palm is among the most commonly seen trees in town. A native of Brazil, it is prized for its beauty; but like most beauties it needs constant trimming and attention. The slender trunk has the color and texture of concrete, and in this climate the tree produces nothing useful but its looks.

The Canary Island Palm, more often than not, is big, fat, neglected, and dateless. But don't feel sorry for it. In warmer climates this tree and its many date-cousins are a main source of food and have even been worshipped. Though their fruit does not ripen in this climate, the trees are useful. Pigeons live in them; kids climb them. Their abundant leaves give more shade than other palms. Think of them as protective aunts who live good, rich lives.

The Senegal Date. Because they exist in clumps and are good for nothing but decoration, these palms may remind you of attorneys. The older they get, the more they bend, a characteristic evolved from living in the wind. Young plants that grow from the base of the cluster are called suckers. These palms are often planted in front of banks and public buildings.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY IAN DRYDEN



The Windmill Palm, on the other hand, is exceedingly ugly and practical. It has a black, hairy trunk and leaves like fans. (Palm leaves come in only two shapes: fan and feather.) The Chinese use the hairy trunk fibers to make rope, hats, even raincoats. Maybe it is this palm's ugliness that makes it so tough.

The Fountain Palm's name is appropriate if you think of the palm as a slow, floral fountain. Like most palms, it is constantly producing a fountain of leaves, flowers, and fruits from its tip—the green, terminal bud. Some people like to eat the bud of the Fountain Palm in a salad, or cook it like a cabbage. This practice, unfortunately, kills the rest of the tree.

The Wine Palm, distinguished by its monumental trunk, is imported from Chile, where Indians have developed a taste for its sap. All sorts of liquor can be made from palms. The East Indians distill a drink called toddy; from the coconut comes a drink called arrack. Palms supply not only liquor, but lumber, cloth, and fiber for Panama hats; needles, fishhooks, furniture polish; sugar, starch, and waxes used in the care of phonograph records.

The King Palm, a blatantly sexual plant, flourishes in gardens but not in the street. At the top of the smooth trunk is a slick, green sheath, four to six feet long. Purple flowers burst from the bottom of the sheath and turn into bundles of little orange fruits. Inedible.

The Pindo Palm's fruit tastes something like pineapple, and can be made into jelly. You should be cautious with this palm, though, as its leaves have stout spines down where the fruit is. In compensation, the palm is nice to look at--its leaves are milky-green. The trunk, short and fat, is excellent for climbing.

The Mexican Blue Palm. Most persons who have been to Baja California and who have left their moist room in the daytime will recognize this palm. Better than advertised, its fronds are a nice, silvery blue.

The Thatch Palm is the kind of palm grown in expensive buildings and on Lord Howe Island, east of Australia. Its leaves are deep green and lush; they make some people think of money. The palm's Latin name--Kentia Forsteriana--is in honor of a senator from New South Wales.

LA GRANDE BOURGEOISE

Foreign Film, Alien City

Bolognini is one of the numberless directors who were granted a cursory once-over during the early 60s boom in foreign movies, and who vanished once the dust from the boom had settled.

DUNCAN SHEPHERD

Faced the past two weeks with the choice of going to Kentucky Fried Movie, Final Chapter--Walking Tall, Grand Theft Auto, Empire of the Ants, The Hills Have Eyes, For the Love of Benji, Herbie Goes to Monte Carlo, and Race for Your Life, Charlie Brown, I made the choice of going to Los Angeles instead. I experienced more than my usual trouble with the freeway there, and spent the better part of the day in the lobby of a towing service talking for hours on the phone with insurance agents and observing blue-collar camaraderie first-hand (paper airplane vs. rubber band fights, etc.), but I also managed, late in the day, to take in Mauro Bolognini's La Grande Bourgeoise at the Royal theater.

There has been, in the event you haven't been paying much attention, a remarkable resurgence of foreign movies lately in Los Angeles, with most of the activity concentrated in the Laemmle theater chain. (The noteworthiest exception is the Oscar-winner from Africa, Black and White in Color, at Mann's Fine Arts theater.) Earlier in the summer, for example, there was the well-rounded anthology of Rainer Werner Fassbinder movies at the Monica Twin theater, which varied its offerings from the remedial (Katzelmacher) to the up-to-the-minute (Chinese Roulette). And currently in midcourse at the Westland Twin is a Spanish series that started with Carlos Saura's newest feature, Cria, then worked backwards in time to Saura's Cousin Angelica, and this week is back further to Saura's The Garden of Delights, which to my mind is better than either of the others (back further, Saura's The Hunt, which is not being screened, is better yet), and will finish with Victor Erice's Spirit of the Beehive, starring Ana Torrent, the guileless juvenile heartbreaker of Saura's Cria.

The Garden of Delights, being Spanish and somewhat surrealistic and decidedly black in its comedy, did not escape the routine comparisons to Bunuel which are the unshakable burden of any director who is Spanish or somewhat surrealistic or decidedly black in his comedy. Saura, though, should be ranked among the most polished craftsmen at work in movies today, and in this one he does a stealthy, meticulous sifting of the vast country estate and the dark memories of a Mr. Moneybags industrialist, now a head-to-toe paralytic.

There is some sharply distinctive, topsy-turvy travestying of Spanish family life: a rubber mat to guard against bedwetting is laid onto the bed of the disempowered patriarch; he is ordered to drink his milk by the visual reinforcement of a nurse's bare breast; his teenage son shakes him by the lapels and tongue-lashes him for laziness, rebelliousness. And there is a lovely performance in the deadpan mode by Jose Luis Lopez Vazquez, a woebegone fellow encased in a body without moving parts.

Aside from La Grande Bourgeoise, also on now, and also Italian, are Ettore Scola's We All Loved Each Other So Much at the Los Feliz and Bruno Bozzetto's Allegro Non Troppo at the Music Hall, either of which may have been a wiser choice to see. Then again, it may have been wiser to drive up Highway 405 instead of 5, or to have swerved right instead of relying on my brakes. Wisdom and I are like strangers in any case, then, as at present quite a number of inviting movies in Los Angeles (always check first the Laemmle theater box in the L.A. Times ads), and I will have another chance to make foolish choices when I go back to reclaim my car.

Not that I regret seeing La Grande Bourgeoise. It's a fairly serious and fairly interesting movie, and I personally would gladly welcome the distribution, en masse, of foreign movies that are no more than fairly interesting and that cannot by any stretch of imagination be labeled as the often-sought antidote to Hollywood. Bolognini is one of the numberless directors who were granted a cursory once-over (mainly, in his case, for Bel Antonio and La Viaccia) during the early 60s boom in foreign movies, and who vanished once the dust from the boom had settled and the foreign movie cargoers had shrunk to Bergman, Fellini, Truffaut, and hardly ever I suspect that this new Bolognini movie wouldn't have gotten around very much if it were not for the suddenly inflated market value of Giancarlo Giannini, its star. Catherine Deneuve, its other, isn't heavy enough on her own to have swung it.

The story, based on an actual incident, concerns the "Murri Affair," a turn-of-the-century murder scandal that toppled one of Italy's eminent families, and brought them, to the last man, to the feet of the gloating public. The actual case is apparently surrounded in clouds, and Bolognini transports it to the screen clouds and all. He sticks close to the known facts as though he believes that, in our enlightened age, public outrage needs to be fed on the truth a strange belief. What the movie really needs is an Elizabethan dramatist's disrespect for history, and a Jacobean's taste for incest, fratricide, blood, and things. What it has, instead, is a housewife's nose for unpleasant odors, and it settles tamely for a place in the recent trend of muckraker movies.

Bolognini has often demonstrated a good instinct for subject matter (his movies as yet undistributed in this country include adaptations of Gautier's Mademoiselle de Maupin and Sverev's Yenshtrej), and the eccentric Murri family makes quite a meaty subject. Within the close family circle, the Murris combine enormous wealth, socialist politics, flagrant atheism, and discreet sexual deviance. Their multiple contradictions and multiple enemies force you to continually revise your judgments, and these things give the movie an ambiguous, subtle, and uncommonly intellectual drift for much of the way. Eventually, though, it develops into a standardized gripe against the strong arm of the law, as the policeman on the case takes it upon himself to railroad anybody who has ever been known to so much as shake hands with one of the Murris. Once the movie hits this glib, smooth-sailing line of attack, some of its most intriguing ideas--the self-destructiveness of the nobility, the divisiveness of the socialists, the loathing of the masses for the intelligentsia--are dropped to the status of footnotes.

Really, the most passionate concern throughout the movie is for presenting the courtly manners of the characters, the translucent parchment-like pallor of Catherine Deneuve (one especially ravishing closeup against a backdrop of luminous lime), the opulent Victorian decors, the all-over muted color tones of pressed flowers, and the omnipresent suffusion of milky, foglike light. When the ideological debate warms up, Bolognini leans instinctively to the side of luxury a

Movies

Duncan Shepherd

Airport '77 — The movie starts in the realm of the ridiculous (the airborn pleasure palace borrows several concepts in first-class travel from THE BIG BUS, and the audience is expected to go ga-ga over them), and the story follows a course even sillier than the forerunners in the AIRPORT series (the attempted heist of a cargo of Old Master oil paintings precipitates a splash-down in the Bermuda Triangle). However, director Jerry Jameson and photographer Philip Lathrop seem exceptionally attuned to the opportunities for visual oddities (the airship skipping like a speed-boat across the Atlantic surface, the sunken plane hoisted from the ocean floor by yellow balloons, etc.), and the swift, sure rescue operation is a doubtless well-deserved clap on the back of the U.S. Navy (a postscript affirms, in essence, that the events of the movie are preposterous, but if they ever were to come true the Navy could handle the problem just the same). Jack Lemmon, Lee Grant, Darren McGavin, Brenda Vaccaro, and James Stewart. 1977.
 (Broadway)

The Black Bird — The overexposed version of THE MALTESE FALCON by John Huston and Company, 1941, is so near to parody itself that no charges of irreverence can be laid upon David Giler's take-off. Irrelevance, maybe. The ideas in this resumption of the bird hunt, though, are frequently amusing: Sam Spade, Jr. has inherited his father's job, debts, secretary, and office ("God, I hate my life"), although the area has gone decidedly downhill ("Hey, man, ain't we got enough spades in this neighborhood?"). The pacing, on the other hand, is often faulty, and the ending is a pratfall. George Segal, Stephane Audran, Lionel Stander, Lee Patrick. 1975.
* (Strand, 9/2 and 3)

Breaking Training — The BAD NEWS BEARS sequel isn't so much a follow-up as it is an Instant Replay—the same ground is gone over in order to get the same laughs, and these kids come off as disturbingly slow learners. The grim prospect at the fadeout is yet a third installment, set in Japan (a new subject for the little WASP second-baseman's racism). William Devane, who has had better jobs but isn't letting on, gets to display his good legs and good form, as he gives the Little Leaguers a crash course in how to "surround the ball" and other basics. With Jackie Earle Haley, Alfred Lutter; directed by Michael Pressman. 1977.
• (Flower Hill Cinema 2)

Bringing Up Baby — Screwball stuff involving, among others, a paleontologist, a society girl with an uncorrectable opinion of herself and an unstoppable word flow, a fox terrier who has buried a priceless brontosaurus bone, a big-game hunter, and a pet leopard who can be soothed by the singing of "I Can't Give You Anything But Love, Baby," all of whom, plus others, come together at top volume for the finale in the sheriff's office. The infectiousness of the thing doesn't come so much from Howard Hawks's directorial touch (he's usually light on drama and hammering on comedy), but from the unaffected and idiosyncratic sense of humor. What Hawks finds funny is easy to identify because of the persistent re-surfacing of the same ideas in other movies: a bookworm for a hero; Cary Grant in women's clothing; a woman oblivious to the fact that the back of her dress is missing; the nagging repetition of a person's name until it sounds like an accusation; etc. Katharine Hepburn, Charles Ruggles, Barry Fitzgerald. 1938.
 (Unicorn)

Bugs Bunny Superstar — A just passable selection of Merrie Melodies, interspersed with reminiscences by the surviving cartoonists (Chuck Jones, who has spoken volumes about these animated animals, is a notable absentee) and memorabilia salvaged from "Termite Terrace," the birthplace of Bugs Bunny on the Warner Brothers lot. A sort of quick guided tour for the uninitiated and the insatiable only. 1976.
* (Vineyard Twin 1)

The Deep — "I can't afford to pass this up. It's an experience!" enthuses the sun-bleached jock to his fainthearted girlfriend, who only wishes to return home safely from her Bermuda holiday. The so-called experience is a Tom Swift-ian adventure involving sunken treasure, a giant moray eel, and voodoo villains. Its undeniable excitements are of the rude, low-blow type that make you leap in your seat, and they are mostly gratuitous, not to say extraneous (the unfortunate girlfriend has her abdomen smeared in blood by masked tormentors using a chicken leg as a paintbrush). Nothing in the movie sets your heart pounding quite as justifiably as the sight of Jacqueline Bisset in a wet T-shirt. With Robert Shaw, Nick Nolte, Louis Gossett; directed by Peter Yates. 1977.
* (Cinema 21)

Fantastic Animation Festival — A collection of 16 animated shorts, including "Bambi Meets Godzilla," "Superman vs. Mechanical Monsters," and award-winning TV commercials; directed by Christopher Padilla.
(Center 3 Cinema 3)

Final Chapter-Walking Tall — Bo Svenson returns as Sheriff Buford Pusser, with Margaret Blye and Forrest Tucker, directed by Jack Starrett.
(Center 3 Cinema 2; South Bay Drive In)

Gimme Shelter — The Maysles' discreetly noncommittal coverage of the Rolling Stones tour that culminates in a fatal knifing at the Altamont free concert. The moviemakers adopt the safe, aloof role of johnny-on-the-spot reporters, and refuse to implicate themselves in the events beyond that. They haven't exactly put all their cards on the table. The cameras never catch as much as you'd wish to see, but they catch enough, especially of the spectacle on-stage, to qualify this as an important, if sketchy, cultural document—on the Stones, the Hell's Angels, Melvin Belli, Grace Slick, Tina Turner, and the avid rock audience. 1971.
 (Ken, 9/2 and 3)

Grand Theft Auto — It's curious how a movie so devoted to speed can be a movie so slow. Ron Howard's directorial debut—a hounds-and-fox chase centered around a couple of smug elopers en route to Vegas in a "borrowed" Rolls Royce—is an attempt to duplicate the slapstick violence of EAT MY DUST, dispensing with the literacy, the detail, and the charm. The job must have looked to Howard easier than it is. 1977.
• (Bijou, Rancho Drive In)

NEW YORK, NEW YORK

The Happy Hooker Goes To Washington — Joey Heatherton as Xaviera Hollander, with Rip Taylor, Jack Carter, and Ray Walston, directed by William Levey.
(Flower Hill Cinema 3; Plaza; State; Aero Drive In; Big Sky Drive In)

Hard Times — Charles Bronson is the archetypal transient loner, stealing in and out of big cities aboard night trains, on a placid, vacant, lonely Panavision screen. This is a far-fetched ballad about he-man virtues, both physical and ethical, surviving in a difficult, debasing underworld—it's about Depression drifters pummeling one another for the bet money to be raised from bare-knuckle pick-up fights on the docks and in the warehouses of New Orleans, the 1930s. Screenwriter Walter Hill, in his first directing effort, has the matter well in hand. He drums up the proper excitement for the man-to-man showdowns; he achieves a pervasive seedy look, sick-green walls and drab costumes, except for James Coburn's unaltered, always-in-the-pink confidence as a reckless gambler; and he demonstrates as well an alert lookout for the peripheral fascinations of a scene—a black kid's methodical sidewalk shuffle, the stalwart folk musicians at an outdoor country jamboree. With Jill Ireland, Strother Martin. 1975.
* (Aztec, through 9/3)

Herbie Goes to Monte Carlo — Disney comedy, with Dean Jones and Don Knotts, directed by Vincent McEveety.
(UA Cinema 1; Midway Drive In)

The Hills Have Eyes — Horror film with Susan Lanier and Martin Speer, made by the man who gave you LAST HOUSE ON THE LEFT, Wes Craven.
(Alvarado Drive In; South Bay Drive In)

The Island of Dr. Moreau — An H.G. Wells political parable, heavily disguised behind some imaginative, half-human, half-animal Halloween makeup and some nice, bristling color (Gerry Fisher, photographer). Somebody behind this project evidently has a nose for a good story, but the film crew seems to be in plodding pursuit of the story rather than in firm command of it. With Burt Lancaster, Michael York, Barbara Carrera; directed by Don Taylor. 1977.
* (Clairemont)

Islands in the Stream — Hemingway's discursive unfinished novel wasn't yet pulled together when the author died, but the moviemakers plow through two barely connected storylines, one a family drama and the other a TO HAVE AND HAVE NOT smuggling escapade, as though they imagine they are dealing with great, fundamental wisdoms ("I know now," they have the hero confide at the end, "there is no one thing that is true. It is all true"). Despite their obvious worshipfulness of him, the moviemakers have tenderized the author, and his worrisome masculinity, with some demonstrative emotionalism, some childish comedy relief, and a final maudlin hallucination in which the penitent loner hero sees himself and his family united in love and in glowing white clothing. George C. Scott is generally a better actor the closer he plays to paralysis, and the stereotyped Hemingway hero seems to inspire him in that direction. But the fictional character, the artist Thomas Hudson, tends to disappear into the Hemingway mystique and the white-whiskers Papa Hemingway makeup job. With David Hemmings, Claire Bloom, Susan Tyrrell; directed by Franklin Schaffner. 1977.
 (La Paloma, 9/4 through 6)

It's Alive — The beginning is a squeamishly funny skit about an abnormally difficult birth and a befuddled team of doctors, and the punchline comes when the newborn babe massacres everybody in the delivery room. If this feat is hard for you to picture, it is also hard for director Larry Cohen. The few glimpses he allows you, in the course of things, of the homicidal infant only make it harder. The movie is much stronger on the unproud father's mortification and perspiration over his role in the creation of the little freak. John Ryan, Sharon Farrell. 1975.
* (Balboa)

Kentucky Fried Movie — Comedy skits by the Kentucky Fried Theater, a Los Angeles-based ensemble.
(Fashion Valley, UA Cinema 3)

The Last Remake of Beau Geste — Marty Feldman, making his directorial debut, borrows heavily from others (especially from Mel Brooks, whose fervent love of old movies drives him to rape and pillage them), and he borrows from himself as well (once he uses a joke, he is more than likely to use it again). If he didn't feel obligated to squeeze a laugh out of the audience every ten seconds, he probably wouldn't have forced himself into such thievery, such redundancy. He does get some good service out of some of his players: Michael York is light-handed and understated as the faultless gentleman hero, James Earl Jones is perfectly ridiculous as a chic sheik with shoe polish on his hair, a smart mustache, a cultivated British accent, and late-Victorian gentleman's-club manners; and Ann-Margret, usually a bit broad, executes an elegant slow-take to an indecent suggestion from piggy Roy Kinnear. 1977.
* (Fashion Valley)

Lumiere — The title is a vague sort of pun, being the French expression for "lights" (as in "lights, camera, action") and also the surname of the pioneer French filmmakers, Louis and Auguste; but apart from the title and the vivacious credits done in carnival colors and a mishmash of lettering styles, Jeanne Moreau's directorial debut is not particularly frolicsome. She indulges herself in the same sort of queenly excesses on one side of the camera as on the other. In the storyline centered around four actress friends, whose basis of friendship is unexplained beyond their like vocation and like sex, there seems to be a noble intention to describe the special nature of an actress's professional and private lives. But this description proceeds more by wish than by observation, and the strength of the intention seeps slowly from the movie as it goes along. This make-believe world comes to look more and more like a feminist paradise: the women are banded together in blissful accord, and their men, all of them sensitive, limp, langorous types, have a perpetual doting, orbiting function. Throughout, the movie maintains the sort of rapturous poetic mood in which a woman, strolling with an admirer across one of Paris's photogenic bridges, feels no inhibitions about reciting the prologue from Ingmar Bergman's HOUR OF THE WOLF. 1976.
 (Ken, 9/1)

MacArthur — Gregory Peck pegs his impersonation of the WWII hero on a few static elements of his makeup—his sunglasses, his monk-ish bald spot, his jutting jaw, his corncob pipe the size of a pump handle. In most everything else, he wisely remains Gregory Peck, and his distinctive, straight-arrow rigidity suffices for the five-star general's famous egoism. As biography, the movie is pretty cursory.

the characters often speak as if they're summing up large issues on an American History essay test, and at one point the script suggests that MacArthur was single-handedly responsible for the post-war Westernization of Japan. There are some stirring speeches, in the Old Hollywood manner of eulogistic biopics starring Paul Muni. But in a more modern manner, there is always a hint of abnormality about the Old Soldier: in his farewell address to a West Point graduating class, he pledges that his final thoughts on this earth will be of "the corps, the corps, and the corps," as his loyal wife, standing in the wings, beams approvingly ("You are my best soldier," he complimented her earlier). With Ed Flanders, Dan O'Herlihy; directed by Joseph Sargent. 1977.

Midway — A milestone of U.S. Naval history is re-created as if specially for buffs of Avalon-Hill war games: a timetable account of all the guesses, gambits, and lucky breaks, as they fell in place, fatefully, in the North Pacific. The father-and-son subplot shows that human interest isn't necessarily as interesting as, say, Chinese checkers. With the interpolation of actual combat footage and footage from an anonymous Japanese war movie, the visual texture of this penny-saving production is pretty choppy. The soundtrack creates most of the excitement, not so much with the Sensurround booms and screeches, but with the radio transmissions of the airplane pilots, screaming like Chick Hearn into their headphones through the action ("Four o'clock! Four o'clock! Get the bastards off me! Help me! Help me!"). Charlton Heston, Henry Fonda, Hal Holbrook, Glenn Ford, and Toshiro Mifune; directed by Jack Smight. 1976.
* (Century Twin 1)

Network — This bombardment of big business, television, and the entire boob-tube generation, and of anything else in the vicinity, is not awfully unlike the "underground" comedy of Bob Downey, Ken Shapiro, Mad Magazine, and the SATURDAY NIGHT LIVE group. It begins with a far-fetched "what if..." premise (in this case, an on-the-air nervous breakdown of a network newscaster) and proceeds to answer the question with the same collegiate impertinance and intemperance with which it was asked. Director Sidney Lumet's penchant for snappish, skittish histrionics is often at cross purposes with author Paddy Chayefsky's eloquent, long-winded tirades. The former permits nary a casual action, a calm moment, a concealed emotion, and the latter permits nary a pause, a stumble, a drawn breath. They end up shedding more heat than light, to coin a phrase, on the high-altitude corporate milieu. The actors—William Holden, Robert Duvall, and even Faye Dunaway—prove to be a good, lively group of combatants, all except Peter Finch, who, as the unhinged newsman, is adrift in his own private realm. (He comes in from the rain, dressed in pajamas and trenchcoat, to do his show, and the doorman salutes him, "How ya doin', Mr. Beale?" "I must make my witness." "Sure thing, Mr. Beale.") With Ned Beatty, Wesley Addy. 1976.
* (Strand, 9/1)

New York, New York — An uncomfortable blend of Hollywood artifices, circa 1945, and bitter feminist truths, circa 1970. NEW YORK, NEW YORK is superficially a musical pastiche, incorporating bits and pieces of Big Band memorabilia, LOVE ME OR LEAVE ME backstage soap opera, MGM's musical fantasies, and the Judy Garland cult. But its Big Subject is the doomed relationship of a sexist saxist (Robert De Niro) who is remorselessly pushy, callous, and self-centered, and a Big Band vocalist (Liza Minnelli) who is in equal degrees career-oriented, marriage-oriented, motherhood-oriented, and is basically well-rounded and perfect. Because of director Martin Scorsese's fidgety, two-faced personality (part-time student, fan, copycat, and part-time didact, auteur, revisionist) and also because of the deleted hour and a half of footage, the movie doesn't hang together at all well; but it has a number of entertaining things, in a number of clashing moods. 1977.
 (Center 3 Cinema 1; Cove; Plaza Twin 2)

One on One — A runty basketball phenom from Colorado, all smiles and yes-sirs, stumbles starry-eyed into the ruthless world of big-time college athletics (UCLA, thinly disguised). In reality, hayseeds like this fellow don't come from Colorado, but come solely from Frank Capra movies (his teammate slips him one pep pill during practice, and he instantaneously behaves like a cheerleader on the sidelines and like a Harlem Globetrotter on the court). Robby Benson, who co-wrote the script, plays the part as if he's recruiting middle-aged mothers and teenage girls for his fan club. He's very sweet, but also very peculiar. Only when he's thrown together briefly with Melanie Griffith does he meet anyone who speaks as strangely as he. The movie has a real sense of purpose—to scandalize us with facts, figures, and fish stories about college athletics—but tends to overstate its case in the harried, compressed, simplified fashion of a TV hour. Directed by Lamont Johnson. 1977.
 (Plaza Twin 1; Grossmont)

Orca — This movie obviously owes its existence to JAWS, but it shows only ingratitude by having Orca the killer whale gobble up a Great White shark in the very first scene. Thereafter, the undisputed ruler of the seas, no mindless eating machine he, demonstrates a fine sense of personal honor, familial devotion, and blind justice. Richard Harris, happily rejuvenated, is the reckless fisherman who offends the noble beast and who gradually loses his swagger as he tries to comprehend the magnitude of his sin against nature (this simple Irish Catholic has to absorb some pretty mind-boggling lessons from a pedantic female oceanographer: "Herman Melville believed if God comes back to earth, he'll come back as a whale"). In general, a slick job by director Michael Anderson and cameraman Ted Moore. Ennio Morricone's romantic musical accompaniment to the whales' graceful aquabatics is not bad, but a very interesting, spooky soundtrack could, and perhaps should, have been composed of nothing but natural whale noises. With Charlotte Rampling. 1977.

The Other Side of Midnight — The world's worst-written tale of love, betrayal, and poetic justice, set in the stormy years before, during, and after World War II. In that far-gone period, this same studio, 20th Century-Fox, might have brought it off in style (dream cast: Gene Tierney, Tyrone Power, Dorothy McGuire; directed by Edmund Goulding). In this period, the "women's film" could sorely use a shot in the arm, but this specimen is sodium pentathol. Marie-France Pisier, John Beck, Susan Sarandon; directed by Charles Jarrott. 1977.
• (Fashion Valley; Parkway 2)

Outlaw Blues — Chase film about an aspiring country-western singer dodging the law; with Peter Fonda and Susan Saint James; directed by Richard Heffron.
(Center 3 Cinema 3; Campus Drive In)

The Parallax View — Wading into the stream of SEVEN DAYS IN MAY and THE MANCHURIAN CANDIDATE, Alan Pakula contributes to feverish political fantasies a thriller about a hypothetical organization for the recruiting of professional assassins. This stuff gets out of hand, readily. The incredible premise—which feigns an attitude of desperate alarm-sounding while it exploits the situation with cool opportunism—becomes less offensive, somehow, because of the equally incredible exposition—a barroom brawl, a splashy fight in river rapids, an obligatory car chase. An indoctrination slide show on the values of God, Country, Mother, Father, the Enemy, etc., is the highlight of the movie, and not merely because it functions as a welcome commercial interlude. Gordon Willis's photography includes some chilling compositions of modern architecture, though his lighting is dimly deficient, as usual. Warren Beatty, Hume Cronyn. 1974.
* (Strand, 9/1)

The Producers — Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder (the latter manages to steal every scene he is in from the former, who has devoted his career to the craft of stealing scenes) play a pair of seedy Jewish theatrical entrepreneurs whose scheme for financial gain depends upon the guaranteed flop of their next show. Their can't-miss choice: "Springtime for Hitler," a musical on Nazism, starring a hipster Hitler (Dick Shawn). Mel Brooks's first movie can hardly stay on any one course for longer than stretches of a few minutes, and it runs short of fuel well before the end, but the nervous, bullying, frenetic, to-and-fro foraging for gag material turns up some of the heartiest laughs in contemporary history. 1968.
* (Ken, 9/4 through 6)

Race for Your Life, Charlie Brown! — Cartoon based on Charles Schultz's PEANUTS characters, directed by Bill Melendez.
(Century Twin 2; Parkway 1; Vineyard Twin 1)

The Rescuers — Disney feature-length cartoon about the International Mouse Prisoners' Aid Society (motto: "We Never Fail to Do What's Right") coming to the rescue of a homely orphan girl held captive in a Louisiana bayou. It has some engaging characters (a dragonfly named Evinrude who bears a faint resemblance to Ben Turpin; a sagging-breasted, false-eyelashed villainess named Medusa) and some rousing action (a couple of crocodiles trying to ferret out two mice from a pipe organ; the plucky Evinrude trying to outrace a voracious horde of vampire bats). The animation, for detail and fluidity, would seem pretty pleasing by the standards of Saturday morning TV, but by the standards the Disney studio has taught us, it is pretty disappointing. Not that the kids will care. 1977.
* (Vogue)

Rollercoaster — Chase thriller about a smug extortionist who bombs rollercoasters merely to show that he means business and who is credulously portrayed as a man of almost superhuman cunning and resource. He appears at a hotel room door in a busboy outfit, wheels in a cart of complimentary food, and plants a magnetic mike inside a lampshade—God only knows how he conjured up any of these props. The various amusement parks are gaily colorful, and the front-seat rollercoaster rides lifted from THIS IS CINERAMA are effectively stomach-churning; the characterizations, though, are not the deepest—Timothy Bottoms' mad bomber has a taste for cotton candy, George Segal's public safety inspector wants to quit smoking, and that's about it. With Richard Widmark, Henry Fonda; directed by James Goldstone. 1977.
* (Cabrillo; Century Twin 1)

Romeo and Juliet — Zeffirelli's super-production of the Shakespeare lovers' tragedy clings to the favorite method of high school drama classes for achieving pizazz — lots of dauntless charging around, to and fro, and lots of yelling. It's true that Olivia Hussey and Leonard Whiting are almost the right age for the early-teen lovers, and that they get some alarming eagerness into their clinches, and Zeffirelli does find some expressive locales; but the movie desperately needs a few breathers from the zest, acrobatics, beauty, expenditure, and whatnot. 1968.
* (Ken, 9/5, 2 p.m.)

Seven Beauties — Lina Wertmuller's flamboyantly cynical treatise on the cost of survival to human dignity. By setting her shaggy-dog tale in Fascist Europe and, ultimately, in a Nazi prison camp, she has facilitated her argument with appeals to ready emotional responses that have been freely exploited in nearby Italian films (THE DAMNED, THE NIGHT PORTER, MASSACRE IN ROME). Wertmuller likes to set down a point and then grind her heel into it. When the proud Spanish anarchist drowns himself in a trough of excrement and the sadsack hero obeys an order to shoot a comrade in the brain, the point has been driven deep into the ground. Wertmuller's impulsive-convulsive-repulsive direction of the material pretty much demolishes any hope of a consistent tone (although Tonino Delli Colli achieves a marvelous consistency in the almost monochromatic images—the damp greens of the forest along the Rhine, the dusty grays of the military prison). Her star, Giancarlo Giannini, enjoys some good moments in the Naples sunshine, strolling around town in white pleated slacks and flirting with the ladies along the way, his hair and mustache waxed and polished, his hat brim and cigarette holder at a waggish tilt, and his head jiggling as if it were attached to a wire spring. But no actor can support the number of closeups Giannini is expected to, with his two puppy-dog expressions—eyes plaintively open-wide or drowsily half-mast. The American actress Shirley Stoler, of HONEYMOON KILLERS, is an inspired choice to play the bulldog-faced Nazi commander—not an inspired role, though. 1975.

 (Strand, 9/4 through 6)

Shampoo — Warren Beatty's self-designed vehicle (he produced and co-wrote) assigns him the role of a womanizing hairdresser who careers along a standardized course for philanderers, ending up in a heap of repentent whimpers. The beauty parlor itself is used merely as a pivot for making quick connections to various stations on the Beverly Hills social circuit. It's a putdown comedy, and the winking observation of manners and mores elicits very few laughs. Still, Robert Towne's dialogue shows a good ear for the discordancies and disjunctions of polite conversation. And Jack Warden's impersonation of a business exec, always self-conscious, always sizing people up, is quite lovely. It is he, more than Julie Christie or Goldie Hawn or Lee Grant, who best represents the hopes and illusions of coiffure art—a plain fellow, rounded, balding, lipless, but spruced up with teased red-orange hair and a with-it, well-tended moustache. Directed by Hal Ashby. 1975.
 (State)

Silver Streak — Innocuous take-off of the LADY VANISHES-NIGHT TRAIN railway thrillers, executed without any sense of the style of the Hitchcock-Reed prototypes, and replacing the sophisticated fun with a more sophomoric type. The poppycock plot has a movie buff's sure feel for standard cloak-and-dagger situations (the funniest gimmick is having the innocent hero—Gene Wilder of the gullible eyes and the distraught hairdo—ejected from the train at regular intervals), but the only participant who appears to understand the proper tone for this sort of thing is Patrick McGoohan, in the role of the suavely sinister art curator from Chicago. Richard Pryor, Jill Clayburgh, Ned Beatty; directed by Arthur Hiller. 1976.
* (Strand, 9/7 and 8)

Sinbad and the Eye of the Tiger — Ray Harryhausen's animated beasties (triplet demons, a brass robot minotaur, a monstrous walrus, a 15-foot troglodyte, an oversized saber-toothed tiger) are enjoyable as ever; but Sam Wanamaker's discombobulated direction (a How-Not-To handbook on composition and editing) renders all the minutes in between Harryhausen's show-stoppers unendurable. With Patrick Wayne and Taryn Power. 1977.
* (Century Twin 2; Parkway 1)

Smokey and the Bandit — With characters called The Bandit, Mr. Big, and Sheriff Buford T. Justice, you might anticipate allegory, but you get nothing more than Southern-fried Keystone Kops. Sally Field, as a chipper chorus girl fleeing from a shotgun wedding, has a natural sense of humor that gives her role an air of improvisation (her doing tap-steps on the inside of the car windshield is a lovely touch), and she also generates some honest sentiment, in between tire squeals and fender bendings, as she reaches out across cultural barriers to a red-neck outlaw who speaks of fun and Waylon Jennings while she speaks of "genius" and Stephen Sondheim. With Burt Reynolds, Jerry Reed, and Jackie Gleason; directed by Hal Needham. 1977.

THE SPY WHO LOVED ME

The Spy Who Loved Me — A scrapbook of earlier Bond escapades. It takes the skiing chase from ON HER MAJESTY'S SECRET SERVICE, the underwater stuff from THUNDERBALL, the fight in the train compartment from FROM RUSSIA, WITH LOVE, the supposedly unassailable criminal fortress and the commando take-over of same from YOU ONLY LIVE TWICE. It even stoops to borrow a gimmick involving a giant crane-operated magnet from the Matt Helm series—one of James Bond's idiot offspring. Lewis Gilbert's direction is smoothly efficient, and Claude Renoir's color work consistently fine—it has the light, luscious look of French partry. But in general, this simpering, feather-headed, imitative installment continues the series' trend toward emasculation—this Bond ought to have his double O's removed. Roger Moore, Barbara Bach, Curt Jurgens, Caroline Munro. 1977.
* (Cinerama; Vineyard Twin 2; Del Mar Drive In; Frontier Drive In)

Start the Revolution Without Me — Bud Yorkin's inventive, inebriated parody of the preposterous intrigues of historical fiction, with Gene Wilder, often a scream, and Donald Sutherland each portraying mismatched twins—dimwit peasants on one side and cruel nobles on the other—who are all brought together by Destiny's design on the eve of the French Revolution. 1969.
* (Ken, 9/4 through 6; Strand, 9/7 and 8)

Star Wars — George Lucas's homage to Flash Gordon embraces, too, some of the beloved cliches of cowboy, swashbuckler, and aviator movies. The story is set in a remote galaxy in the remote past, so that it can't be mistaken as a reflection of anything in modern-day society except Hollywood hokum, and it can be recommended warmly to anyone with a mental age of under twelve. The miniatures and special effects are the best that money can buy, the wholesome heroes, Mark Hamill and Harrison Ford, look as though they've been recruited from a volleyball court on the California coast; the anthropomorphized robots, especially the crotchety one who talks in the voice of a prissy British valet ("I've got such a bad case of dust contamination I can barely move"), are as adorable as your household pets; and the narrative, despite a bewildering prologue three paragraphs in length, is not so complicated or imaginative as an average Captain America comic. Should Lucas be thought primarily benevolent for giving the audience such blissful, innocent, simple-minded thrills, or primarily cynical for deciding the audience requires nothing more? With Alec Guinness, Carrie Fisher, Peter Cushing. 1977.
 (Valley Circle)

The Sting — The BUTCH CASSIDY gang, Redford and Newman and director George Roy Hill, regroups for a MISSION IMPOSSIBLE-like caper (you can never be sure that even the snafus aren't part of the fake-out scheme) set in the urban 1930s. Re-creation of the period is pretty thorough in terms of interior decoration and clothing styles, but in terms of cinematic style it is done absent-mindedly, a dash here, a pinch there. The movie's main concern, though, is that you like the stars and pray for them to come through unscathed. Newman by now presumes you like him or no longer cares, while Redford keeps on pushing, pushing. With Robert Shaw. 1973.

Suspiria — Italian-made thriller with Jessica Harper, Joan Bennett, and Alida Valli, directed by Dario Argento.
(Balboa; College)

Swept Away by an Unusual Destiny in the Blue Sea of August — Lina Wertmuller's ADMIRABLE CRICHTON with new wrinkles. A rich bitch (Mariangela Melato) dishes out undiluted contempt to the hired help on a yachting expedition, but when she and one of the sailors (Giancarlo Giannini) are cut off from the rest and marooned on an uninhabited Mediterranean island, the tables are turned on her. The script often seems to preach communism, but the action bespeaks male supremacy, and the moral of Wertmuller's little parable is hopelessly garbled. In any case, the structure is faulty—first the conflict goes all one way, then it goes all the other, and at the drawn-out resolution it doesn't know where to go. Wertmuller's direction favors loud voices and applause lines (mostly the ideological debate is carried out on the level of name-calling); but her color scheme of sea, sky, sand, and tanned skin provides an agreeable setting. 1975.

Tentacles — Giant octopus invades Ocean Beach; filmed partially in San Diego; starring John Huston, Shelley Winters, Claudia Akins, and Henry Fonda; directed by Oliver Hellman.
(Cas.no; UA Cinema 2; Frontier Drive In; Bijou; Rancho Drive In)

Tomb of Ligeia — Roger Corman's last attempted adaptation of a Poe story, and one of the best of them. As in the others, the Poe tale, presumably too loggy and prosaic, serves just as the springboard for a flight of necrophiliac imagination. Good, somber use made of the green English countryside and the aging burlings; very subdued use made of Vincent Price's party-faced anguish; exciting eruption of hysteria at the finish, with Price making like a lion tamer, cracking a whip at an uncanny housecat and flames inching toward the ceiling. Script by Robert Towne (CHINATOWN, SHAMPOO) 1965.

Tunnelvision — It is 1983 and the president of a revolutionary TV network has been called before a Senate committee to defend the licentious programming policies that have captured an 85 percent share of the viewing audience. The evidence shown to back up this conceited prelude proves to be nothing but run-of-the-mill TV fare, gagged up, smuttied up, botched up. Directed by Neil Israel. 1976.
* (UA Cinema 3)

Veronique — The directorial debut of Jaqueline Guillemaine, ex-former assistant to Eric Rohmer. San Diego premiere. 1978.
(Kan, 9/1)

Vigilante Force — A kill-crazy Vietnam veteran is summoned home to protect the local rylals from a horde of oil workers, who have besieged the town in Attila-the-Hun style. He misuses his new authority to requisition machine guns, grenades, and bazookas ("We've got enough fire power here to re-take Saigon"), and to recruit a mob of old Army buddies, paid thugs, racketeers, and prostitutes, and he finally provokes his peace-able brother, dressed in baseball cap and bluejean overalls, to a showdown. For all the fiery explo-sions and somersault stunts, the war between siblings suggests nothing so much as neighborhood kids charging helter-skelter, play-ing soldier. Don't these people—Kris Kristofferson, Jan-Michael Vincent, Bernadette Peters, and Victoria Principal—have anything be-ter to do? Written and directed by George Armitage. 1978.
* (Del Mar Drive In; Frontier Drive In)

Women in Revolt — Also known, and probably better known, as REVOLTING WOMEN. Andy Warr-hol's inchtanrare, bitchy mumcking of the forms of expression taken by the women's lib movement—on talk shows, at sisterhood rap sessions, etc. It's a lot of talk, for sure. Fortunately, the casting of under-cover males in the main female roles is not the sharpest joke of the slow evening. Candy Darling, Holly Woodlawn, 1972.
* (Fine Arts, 9/2, midnight)

Young Frankenstein — Mel Brooks's insular and familiar spoof of the old Universal Pictures horror series—it doesn't reach very far in any direction, but it exerts a good deal of comic verve within the narrow confines. Basically, it resembles the sort of affectionate parody of old movies common on the CAROL BURNETT SHOW, although it is larger, fuller, and funnier. Brooks's stature as a movemaker is enhanced consider-ably by his efforts to extend the parody even to the Hollywood sti, 'lo techniques of the 1930s. On that score, he outstrips his closest competitor in movie comedy, Woody Allen, who has long grev-itated toward old movies in search of subject matter, but whose comic copies duplicate the proper cine-matic style haphazardly at best; in his performances as well, whether he is impersonating a bank robber, a Latin American revolutionary, a robot, or a Bogart tough guy, Allen is always undermined by his feelings of imposture. Brooks suffers from no such insecurities. With Gene Wilder, Madeline Kahn, Marty Feldman, Cloris Leachman, and Gene Hackman. 1974.

CHARLIE JOINER

ALAN PESIN

In their first four exhibition football games, New York Jet quarterbacks attempted 81 passes and were sacked seven times for a total loss of 50 yards.

In the first three Los Angeles Rams exhibition football games Joe Namath attempted 20 passes and was sacked seven times for a total loss of 70 yards.

After the Rams lost to the San Francisco 49ers, in a game in which Namath completed only six of 15 passes and was sacked five times, New York Jets offensive lineman Randy Rasmussen was quoted as saying (with a snicker), "If Namath could take a step to the side once in a while, or didn't always throw on second and long, maybe he wouldn't get sacked so often."

It has also been reported in New York newspapers that Joe Na-math was once offered in a straight-up trade for New York Giant quarterback Craig Morton, but the Giant front office opted for a Morton-Steve Ramsey trade with the Denver Broncos instead.

Meanwhile, though exhibition football wins and losses don't mean a thing (for example, the Seattle Seahawk's record or the Eagles' 21-10 victory over the Pa-triots), the San Diego Chargers, after four meaningless exhibition games, have revealed an offense superior to every team in their division except Oakland.

At quarterback the Chargers have their first major-leaguer since John Hadl's heyday. Los Angeles Rams castoff James Har-ris has the strongest arm in the National Football League, and in receivers Charlie Joiner and John-ny Rodgers, men who can get to the ball wherever Harris wants to pass it.

The Charger backfield of Don Woods and Ricky Young, with back-ups Joe Washington and Bo Matthews, has finally begun to jell. It is up to coach Tommy Prothro to make good use of all four.

The offensive line, led by Doug Wilkerson, is recognized as one of the best, after years of juggling be-cause of injuries and discontent. And the problems at tight end, where Pat Curran played so well last year, should be solved now that ex-Ram Bob Klein has come to terms with management.

As usual with teams on the up-swing, tough schedules and pres-sure-situation collapses (fumbles, missed assignments, bad punts, blocked field goal attempts, all at crucial times) cannot be pre-vented. The best teams can take advantage of the smallest weak-nesses and rain them down the opposition's throats. In the past the Chargers blew too many games with turning-point errors (Bo Matthews' annual goal-line fumbles against the Denver Bron-cos). However, the Chargers, at least on offense, have the talent and coaching to avoid these blun-ders this year.

Last week's drawings for the U.S. Open tennis championships' first-round pairings ended with a major faux pas by tournament ref-eree Mike Blanchard when he drew from a USLTA silver punch-bowl the name of controversial transsexual Dr. Renee Richards and placed it alongside the name of third-seeded 1977 Wimbledon champion Virginia Wade.

Dr. Richards, who was first ex-posed (both figuratively and liter-ally) after winning a local tourna-ment at the La Jolla Beach and Tennis Club, was permitted to en-ter the main draw after a New York State Supreme Court judge ruled that Richards would not have to pass the chromosome tests which had prevented her from participating in major wo-men's tennis tour events in the past.

This afternoon's match between Richards and Wade in front of a standing-room-only crowd at Forest Hills will answer once and for all at least three questions, if not more.

RUDOLF NUREYEV. NADIA POTTS. NATIONAL BALLET OF CANADA

National Ballet of Canada, at the Greek Theatre, 2700 North Vermont Avenue, Los Angeles, Ca. 92007. September 2-4, 6-10 at 8:30 p.m. (213) 660-8400.

The National Ballet of Canada will dance at the Greek Theatre in Los Angeles this week. Guest artist Rudolf Nureyev and a company of 120 will be in residence at the Griffith Park amphitheater for a two-week engagement. Mr. Nureyev is scheduled to dance all performances, and tickets are still available. The program for Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, September 2, 3, and 4, is Bayaderka, Offenbach in the Underworld, and Four Schumann Pieces. The following week—Tuesday through Saturday—the full-length Swan Lake will grace the stage. Ticket prices for the ballet are $7, $10, and $12.50.

James Niederlander, active in San Diego at the Fox Theatre, has taken over the bookings for the Greek Theatre this season, and while there are complaints from the local residents that there are too many "rock concerts" on the bill, there does seem to have been an effort made to balance the entertainment. Following the National Ballet of Canada, there will be a benefit performance September 11 with Julie Andrews and Henry Mancini. Englebert Humperdinck appears September 11-17, followed September 21-24 by Gladys Knight and the Pips with special guest Jimmie Walker. Shirley Bassey is at center stage September 25-27, and Seals and Croft finish the season September 29-October 1.

The Greek Theatre is an outdoor amphitheater with 4,500 seats located in Griffith Park. It is almost small enough to be effective, but the management has embraced a practice I abhor—oversamplification of sound. While individual artists certainly need to be adequately mixed on the Greek, to amplify a full orchestra, as was recently done at a Cleo Laine-Bobby Short concert I attended, can serve only one purpose in my mind, and that is to make the sound come as close as possible to that of a recording. While this suggestion may seem ludicrous, recording companies are responsible for most of the public appearances of artists under contract to them, and their primary objective in choosing back-up for those artists and determining how it is to be used is for the purpose of selling records. It, on the other hand, it is public demand rather than corporate greed that is responsible for the anachronism of sitting out under the stars listening to live entertainers who sound as if they are "produced in Hollywood," then it seems that the separation between the performer and the audience must soon be complete.

Dance, however, is an art form which is very difficult to record. The National Ballet of Canada is a superior company and Rudolf Nureyev is indisputably one of the world's premier dancers. They will be at the Greek Theatre—undoubtedly with a fully amplified orchestra—for the next two weeks. Go see them, and forget about the sound.

They invest in records they know will soon be deleted and for which they hope there will be a demand over the years; they buy the record libraries of those collectors who have been crushed to death under piles of Pastoral symphonies; they spend out lists, timing what the market will bear; they search, they speculate, they sell—and they give the collector those heady thrills of sudden opportunity, of unexpected windfall, of the miraculous chance to fill in a gap, in that extreme cases far outweigh any pleasure the music itself might give.

Suppose you have become a devotee of the music of Roger Sessions. Now, one of the chief characteristics of Sessions' music (there cannot be more than 300 people in the whole world who really like this composer) is that recordings of his works are withdrawn almost the moment they are issued: it is as though the record industry executives feel they have done their duty by modern American music just in producing the recording, but actually to attempt to sell it would be asking a bit too much. The moment the facial black diamond appears next to the listing in the Schwann catalog (the standard American catalog of classical and popular records), the price at the specialized dealers goes up by a good 30 or 100 percent. Collectors who have been dithering over their purchase of 10 DC particular Sessions item suddenly curse themselves for their dilatoriness; how can they possibly go on living without that indispensable record of Sessions' Third Symphony, which RCA has decided to cast into limbo after a few months of barely perceptible sales? Out goes the desperate letter to Woodstock, where canny Gerber has been stockpiling Sessions against this very day; in comes his quotation: $8.50; but what choice does the improvident collector have? Better $8.50 now than double that next year.

For by next year the record will no longer be a recent deletion, which, after all, one might still by chance pick up in a neglected corner of a regular record store. It will be a rarity, a collector's item, and its price then will range from 15 to 25 dollars, and even more. Up till this week, the highest price I had ever heard asked for a single record was $200, which is currently being demanded by Roundsound West (the Leucadia dealer) for the original recording of Bette Davis in the musical comedy Two's Company—on the assumption, I suppose, that anyone who wants to hear Bette Davis singing must be out of his mind to begin with. But I understand that there are now some dealers offering up to $700 for a mint copy of Elvis Presley's earliest San 45 RPM—and what they will then sell the thing for is anybody's guess. Classical recordings never rise into that financial empyrean: even in death and deletion, classical music remains a very poor relation of pop. Still, imagine the state of soul of a collector who will shell out $25 for Roger Sessions' Third Symphony—the extravagance, the compulsiveness, the dirtying loss of standards, and for a work that scarcely anyone can even stand. I cannot help but pity such a person—and laugh at him, since I picked up my own copy for a mere two sawbucks, in a quick and secret exchange in the parking lot of a San Bernardino Taco Bell.

When you have arrived at this point, spiritually degraded, overdrawn at the bank, unable to eat because all your tables and chairs are stacked high with records, when you spend half your time hanging about the mailbox, waiting for the next issue of High Fidelity or the next list of EMI imports (for by now you know that the European pressings are always better than the American ones, even if they cost twice as much), when you discover yourself to be irretrievably in the hands of the rapacious Fred Steinmetz and the merciless Ed Durbeck—then you will know that you are not simply a record buyer but an evil collector, certified, chronic, and doomed. You have come a long way since that petty little emotional struggle over the comparative merits of various Persian bosoms, when you were so apprehensive about wasting your five dollars on what might turn out to be only the second-best Scheherazade. The struggle then was hard, but now you have got the habit of it all, and it is easy, so very easy. Easy as dunting with the sea. And when you find a moment or two to listen to one of your thousands of records, what pleasant memories it calls up of your innocent youth as an ordinary lover of music, before you found your true vocation. □
