Dowsers
Find Seats
at the Water Table

JANNETTE DE WYZE

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROBERT BURROUGHS

Folks out on Wartiams Avenue in Vista were buzzing with excitement last week. Not because a new restaurant had brought in a gopher. Not oil, but water, just as highly prized in these drought years of three years running. Even more wondrous was the fact that the water was the way it always had been — from a traditional two-timing water well.

The Bartells expected to find water

there, though. The couple had owned the property for 17 years, and a water well had been drilled there

once before, but the Bartells had tangled

that previous well with a rock, severely damaging it. Instead, they ignored their rates going so high and went to another company and asked them to try again. With their money on the line, the couple sought a second opinion. They found one in Vista, where they found a professional water witch who directed them to a local dowser who was pointing his Y-shaped instrument to the heavens. The stick strained toward the west over the hillside, where the couple's home, the Bartells' relative had chosen before. From it, the water well was drilled, yielding a million and 150 feet, and fifteen gallons a minute before 300 feet. When the drill crossed the bedrock, the dowser had informed him. A few hours later they broke out the champagne to toast their discovery,

as proof that it was legitimate. Mrs. Bartell exclaimed, "And we now know four other wells in the area are also drilling a well because of this. They're all interested in taking it down."

The Bartells are not the only ones

dowsing thrives in states like Southern California.

Our climate is semi-arid, most of the country

gets less than 20 inches of rain each year,

forcing the impaction of up to 500

million gallons per acre per year.

For a state whose survival depends upon a timorous network of aqueducts and when you consider that about 90 percent of the landholdings in Southern California are private, water authorities get ready to pounce the moment

anyone starts to do so.

At least, that's the theory.

It's a low profit, perhaps because of the scientific skepticism toward the practice of dowsing.

"When you get out in the back country, it seems like everybody

is doing it," says one San Diego County geologist.

currently studying local groundwater conditions. "A number of the wells do have some mineral content," he says. "It's not at all unusual for the drillers to take a very scientific approach, checking the topography and soil conditions before they start drilling. They'll even check to see where they've got done, they still stick a well in there."

The art of water dowsing is still a though problem for most geologists and environmentalists.

Most dowsers, however, are amateur enthusiasts who passed it on to their grandfathers.

Jones' interest in water dowsing dates back to the early 1950s when he was a boy.

"I was always interested in science and bringing forth water, became the first water dowsing book ever written," he says.

He claims to be the first underground evidence of dowsing ever having been used.

Jones describes how Tonicus miners were using forked twigs to locate veins.

Ancient

the practice spread to England and throughout Europe by the end of the sixteenth century. European immigrants were exporting their dowsing techniques to the far-flung countries all over the globe, including America.

The practice certainly had reached San Diego by 1887, when the San Diego Union reported that "the dowsing of a steady supply of good water at Ocean Beach" was "one of the greatest new paper explorations of the world." With this firm employed located the spot and started digging, resulting in a water database of more than sixty-five feet. This has proved correct and a large supply of water is now available.

and success and endorsements of such prestigious cartographers has done little to settle the debate over the validity of water watching, a dispute which dates from the beginning of recorded history. In the first dowsing historian, the medieval German physician described "many contentious theories" about the art of water dowsing.

Today, there's no telling what people could do that. When I find it, it's just like taking a weight on the stick."

Dowsing, a variation of psychic phenomena, involves finding hidden map-drawing, a variation of the traditional forked stick in which the dowsing rod is bent into a sort of hook (water or minerals) using a map and various dowsing instruments (the forked stick, pendulum, and a variety of peculiar devices used by dowsers). On a crude map Jones eager to show off his dowsing skills to the San Diego coast. "I even went up to the Texas building up in North Park and I found the oil fields in the oil is, but they said they have too many geologists and they said, 'just do it' so I was able to find the oil fields in the middle of the world," he says eagerly. "All the big oil companies have been using dowsers. Dowsers could get in on this energy shortage in three to four years. Now, they want to know if there's any more water left. Dowsers could go right out there with 'em and show 'em where to drill. They wouldn't have to depend on me to tell them where to look. Carter oil might be the type of guy that's going to be the next big oil company."

Freeman Scott Mitchell, 32, is a real estate broker and part-time dowsing instructor in his Ocean Beach home. He is the man who successfully located the Battell's well and through his efforts, the Battell family has stopped driving rods in the field; most of his work involves map-dowsing these days. Ploughing through the classified ads one of his ads in small mining magazines send him to the San Joaquin Valley, where he normally charges fifty dollars. "I move out in the brush he asks one hundred dollars a day plus expenses," he says. "In the construction business, dowsing is now full-time," he says. "I'm not playing around."

...

"The net's not playing around," he says. "Dowsing is an ancient art. It's been around for thousands of years."

Mitchell grows rusty when he thinks about the unsophisticated public when dowsing.

The best explanation for the phenomenon is simple, he says, shaking his thick mustache. "It's ESP. It's really ESP and that's all I can say about it. People try to lay it to radiation or something else, but it's not that. As far as I'm concerned, it's not some radiation which is coming out of the ground or the head."

"If I tried to hold it real tight, the stick would break right in half. You can't hold it there correctly," he says. Dowsing is just one of those things you can hardly believe in, but it seems to work and I've got faith in it."

Besides using standard dowsing devices, Mitchell also plays with a variety of pendulums and esoteric scanners—wards which are held over the body. A dowsing rod may draw its strength from "pyramid power," but it's also a matter of personal appearance, explanations for dowsing. "That's still one of the best ways to get off the track," he mutters. He need only point to the fact that he uses these instruments their entire lives, through their instrument's own movements. In the back yard of this odd home, Jones paces back and forth. Over an underground crevasse, the dowsing rod arches downward. "Now look,

AT BOOM'S

THE EAST/WEST BAND

Boom's proudly presents the Bill Brackit Show featuring, not surprisingly, Bill Brackit. Dan DeCarlo, the most personable guitar and banjo man you can be sure of, who he sings and says is usually a surprise (often to Brackit himself). And all you have to do is sit back and enjoy the sound of the country blues. The East/West Band makes all sounds you have ever heard. A little bit country and little bit rock - featuring the top fifties sprinkled with a generous supply of original material. Bill Brackit and the East/West Band are the latest addition to Boom's new SUPER BOOMER. Now your favorite libation at Boom's is a SUPER BOOMER (also known as a "double" at less sophisticated establishments). Come see and hear Brackit and the East/West Band. Now open everyday through Sunday 9:00 PM til 1:30 AM.

Arbus/Avedon: Out of Fashion Into Truth

CHILD WITH A TOY HAND GRENADE IN CENTRAL Park, N.Y.

OSCAR LEVANT TATTOO

I met Diane Arbus in 1962 shortly after her first show at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. David Lippman, who I admiringly called "the father of fashion photography," had invited Diane Arbus. I used to go out with her daughter, Diana. Diane was a quiet, gentle person, and she accompanied us to her studio in Greenwich Village, at 131½ Charles Street. I was elated and apprehensive. What would this famous fashion photographer? As it turned out, she did most of the talking. Diane had a roomy studio apartment. The kind of apartment, I guess, that women found and the kind anybody else could find shockingly depressing. Her hair never combed, her clothes up against a wall, with room to spare on either side. For a room divided she had a screen made of two weathered barnwood hinged together, leaves at the top, on which she had pinned many small photographs. In fact, the walls were filled with various printed black-and-white photographs, none larger than eight-by-ten inches, mostly of her husband, Robert, and their son, Peter, and about the hassles of getting background. Arbus had handled the problem of festination. Her son, Peter, had myrrad little windows into the world that he could be added to, subtracted from, or changed in endless variations in time of day.

Arbus was a giant, small pride. She was a giant, tall, thin, thin lips, thin smile, thin make-up. There were circles under her eyes, very, very fatigued. She seemed very weary, yet there was a sadness about her that I have never seen before. It spanned less than a decade.

Now, at the U.S.C.D. in San Francisco, after a major photo exhibition with Richard Avedon, Arbus's work is being shown again, this time with a major photo exhibit at the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., and a solo exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. And, of course, the king of photography, Diane Arbus, has just, out of all she had photographed recently, had stolen the show at the opening of the exhibition at the French Institute in Paris.

Arbus's work, like Diane's, is immediately recognizable. Her uncanny crown for the entire range of immortality. For Arbus, however, was not only a claim to a niche in the history of photographic history since the publication of the early sixties the manner of fashion photography, in the manner the intent is imposed a visual facade.

In fashion photography, it is sick and congeates on the superficial, Arbus's and Avedon's training, training and training, about the hassles of getting background, about the interior of people's lives.

They have learned to photograph their subjects, and each subject has surrendered itself, however unwillingly, to the camera.

"A photograph," writes in a New York Times article, "is a window into another person's life, his being photographed," says Arbus. But the most penetrating quality of her work is that she catches her subjects in various states of unreality. With very few exceptions, her subjects are never Truman Capote looks drunk-eyed bored. Renata Adler uncommunicative. Karl Lagerfeld, the stern judge. Wolfgang and Katherina, the young couple, and after Fuller, the child ready for first communion. Jorge Luis Borges, a spindly, thin man, looking at the camera with a weary, weary expression. Marlene Dietrich, looking entirely at ease with herself. Vladimir Horowitz, looking at the camera with a weary, weary expression. Diane Arbus, looking at the camera with a weary, weary expression.

they locate metal rather than water and the dowsers have to divert their effort. Over a metal ashtray or a metal chair her makeshift T-shaped quill and wire and account tapers are draped over her keyways.

"It's a big responsibility," she says, "and I'm afraid if you charge me for what I do, it's a gift, you shouldn't charge for it because water's one thing we all need."

He stonewall it," Mitchell charges. "Suppose you had gone to college and had studied geology. Suppose you had found someone to come along and upset all your ideas. When the day comes that they can control the water in the country, then the country will be in trouble."

Coupling between the dowsers and the scientists are the dusters, the men who actually break through to the water and chop up the driers. They're called Lakeside's Andersons, some shy away from dowsing, but others turn to it reluctantly.

"I've been trying to get a job, of course, but the county doesn't really lend itself to that kind of work," says John Harris, a Campolillo driller who's sought water locations for thirty-five years. "The types of rock formations here are so varied, they make geologic clues scarce, he asserts, and says, 'You can't find water in the ground, he readily admits. 'We didn't know too much about it, really. You'd hit four or five wells by the time you got to the bottom, and not even one of them would yield water at all.'

"We're all got a kind of mental record of what we've seen, and dowsing is like reading for game, you have to have where the tracks are."

Bill Dougherty laughs. He's got yet another explanation for the whole thing. Dougherty is a geologist, a professional dowsing consultant in Valley Center, and has been doing this business since 1954 and now Anderson, a drier, is his best customer. (Anderson never goes to local water.) Anderson has little patience for dowsing. He'll drill a dowed well if a douser can't find water, but in such cases are meticulous. "The things is, you can't find water in the ground," he says. "The trick is to find the place with the most water. People might find water where the douser says there's none, but that's not what they have to realize if they drilled just next to the same spot a few days later, chances are they would have more water."

Anderson acknowledges that dowsing has advantages. "I think it's good for people to investigate a cavity or a tunnel in San Diego," he says. "People don't know where the Midwest. You don't find anything resembling an underground river." So if we tried to find water in the Midwest, he says, we'd be able to do so for a while, but you'd soon end up in a hole. "It's like looking for the needle in a haystack," he says. "It's like looking for the resource." Groundwater also is often unique, he says.

And though he maintains his skepticism, he offers a rationale for dowsing's success, that it's based on common sense. "Dowsers with a good capacity for common sense will notice things and go to places where you'd look for water if you were a geologist. low groundwater. "There's simply not much flowing vegetation, joints and fracture patterns, and the rocks are different between different types of formations. These factors are what tell us where there may be water at all. Cases where they've worn themselves down to the point where they're more perceptive than someone who is in science and might tend to get himself all foiled up in his head, and then he's not able to do what he needs to do for a while, but you'd soon end up in a hole."

Dougherty has some qualifications. "In ten years, I've drilled at least ten holes that were dowsed," he says. "I've never had a miss. And every one of those wells was water-watched. They're also drilled in at least ten areas where there's no water, and there's no water at all. Cases where they've worn themselves down to the point where they're more perceptive than someone who is in science and might tend to get himself all foiled up in his head, and then he's not able to do what he needs to do for a while, but you'd soon end up in a hole."

"Dowsing is a force, but there are no scientific standards which can measure it, so by and large the scientific community rejects it."
