As a ten-year-old exploring the dark corners of my family's garage, I once found a huge knife sheathed in a worn leather case. It had a rawhide handle and an eight-inch steel blade. When I asked my father about it, he told me it was from his days as a bomber pilot in the Pacific during World War II.

He pulled a silk map of the western Pacific from a drawer in his desk and showed it to me; it was made of cloth, he explained, so that in case he was shot down and had to ditch over the ocean, the map wouldn't get waterlogged and fall apart. The knife was for protection in similar circumstances. "Weren't you afraid of dying?" I asked.

She Should Have A Petubody, not because she's entitled, but because she's entitled to a pet. She's entitled to anything and she's entitled to have a pet.

Re: 1.4I have no idea why anybody would want to buy a Petubody. It's just a silly name for a dog, and it's not even a particularly good name for a dog. I don't know what you're talking about.

Re: 2.3I think it's a great name for a dog. It's short, sweet, and easy to say. I like it a lot.

We Thought Someone Had Dibbed

A recent letter (2.4), from a GSP reader who claims to have been the first to use the name "Dibbed," prompted me to look into the history of the term. I discovered that the first recorded use of the term was in 1852, in a book titled "The History of the English Language," by Samuel Johnson. The term "Dibbed" is derived from the Old English word "dibba," which means "to dig." The term was originally used to describe a person who was digging a hole in the ground, but it eventually came to be used as a verb, meaning to dig or to make a hole. The term "Dibbed" is still used today, most commonly in the context of someone who is digging a hole in the ground.

By the Way, The King Is Dead

JONATHAN BAVELLE

There is a story about a bus trip in southern France that is told so often that it seems to have become a legend. In the story, a group of tourists is traveling on a bus when they overhear a conversation between two Frenchmen. One of the Frenchmen is saying to the other, "By the way, the king is dead." The other Frenchman responds, "I know, but what's the matter with him?" The first Frenchman replies, "I don't know, but I think he might have the flu." The tourists overhear the conversation and are so impressed by the story that they decide to follow the same path as the Frenchmen and visit the same places.

The bus trip takes the tourists through some of the most beautiful landscapes in southern France. They visit the cities of Aix-en-Provence and Avignon, and they see the famous lavender fields near the village of Sault. They also visit the ancient city of Carcassonne, which is a UNESCO World Heritage Site.

As they travel, the tourists encounter a variety of people and cultures. They see the traditional French countryside, with its fields of wheat and vineyards. They also see the modern city of Toulouse, which is home to the University of Toulouse and the Toulouse Regional Council. They visit the City of the Three Bridges, which is known for its three bridges over the Garonne River.

The bus trip ends in the city of Cannes, which is famous for its film festival. The tourists attend the festival and see some of the films that are being shown. They also visit the city of Nice, which is a popular tourist destination.

Overall, the bus trip is a memorable and educational experience for the tourists. They are able to see some of the most beautiful places in southern France and learn about the history and culture of the region. The story about the king being dead is just one of the many interesting stories that they hear on their trip.
