The Guns of San Diego
Stories from local policemen of their encounters with a very well-armed public

By Steve Sorensen

It was three o'clock in the morning and San Diego Police Officer Steve Hawkins, a young cop just two months out of the training academy, was working his pre-dawn shift. Hawkins had been assigned to the Westside Group Station, and he was parked at the corner of Grape Street and West Boulevard when he saw a young Latino rounding the corner.

Hawkins recalls, "I saw a young man walking down the street. He looked like he was in his late 20s or early 30s. He was carrying what looked like a .44 Magnum. I immediately thought, 'What's going on here?'"

Hawkins pulled up next to the young man and asked, "Hey, what's going on?" The young man looked up at Hawkins and said, "Nothing. I just wanted to walk down the street." Hawkins was not satisfied with this answer and got into his patrol car to radio for backup.

By the time Hawkins got back to the scene, the young man had disappeared down the street. Hawkins and his partner were able to trace the young man's path and found him hiding behind a nearby building.

Hawkins asked the young man, "Why did you run?" The young man replied, "I didn't do anything. I was just walking down the street." Hawkins was not convinced and arrested the young man for disorderly conduct.

But where was the gun? Hawkins searched the young man's pockets but found nothing. Hawkins then searched the young man's car and found a .44 Magnum in the glove compartment. The young man was later charged with possession of a firearm.

Hawkins was surprised by the number of firearms he encountered during his shift. He estimated that at least 20% of the people he stopped had firearms on their persons.

"It's not just the young people," Hawkins said. "I've stopped middle-aged men and women who were carrying guns. It's a real problem here in San Diego."

Hawkins believes that the presence of firearms on the streets is contributing to the high crime rate in San Diego. He says, "We need to do something about this. We can't keep letting people carry guns."

SAN DIEGO'S REPEALS ABORTION LAW

A new round of decision-making is required as the campaign for the Nov. 6 general election reaches its final stages. The campaign is now focused on whether to repeal or retain the law. The measure was passed by the city council last week.

"You should have gone ahead and shot him," the passenger replied. Hawkins never found out why they had shot their headlight off, but if he had done it himself, he would have done it differently. "I'll do it again," he said. Hawkins later learned that the driver plus two accomplices had an automatic rifle and a handgun and the passenger got off with no charges whatsoever. "That just blew us away," Hawkins says. The man had been threatened for an apparent issue, and a potential cop-killer was back on the street. Now the young man knows what most San Diego police officers know: taking guns seriously is important and ready to use them is a routine part of the job, and because of the constitutional protection of the right to bear arms, most of the time the charges against the gun-toters don't even amount to a felony.

In the back corner of the dispatch police headquarters on Market Street, across the Bell from the downtown jail, is a door with a sign on it that reads: "Gun Desk." Sean Donovan, a young cop, sits in that cubby, dusty 10x10 room forty hours a week and loves it. His job: to see if any weapons are on the street and if any of the 2270 guns in the city may be in the hands of someone who is not supposed to have them. He started in police work as a police officer in 1977 and that went well for a while, until one year with the #2 gun in the city of any age, which means that the man or woman who has it is not supposed to have it. This year the number of deaths from illegal guns has doubled and many of the weapons are not registered. He thinks that there is a big problem here, and he would like to see a change in the law.
By percentage of members on the force, a cop in San Diego is ten times more likely to be killed than a cop in Chicago.

Kramer says his new position allows him to make up for missed time. "I was stuck in the traffic jams, and I missed it all. But now I have a chance to see the country and meet people."

Kramer says he's never ventured more than a few miles from his home. "I never thought I'd be out here doing this. But now I'm on the road, and I'm glad I'm here."
Guns

"We were being communicated. No way, ma. This is an expensive gun. I’ve got to make sure it’s secure. If you wanna get shot, you’ll have to pay for it." Kramer countered.

The guy stopped the machine gun, his buddy stopped the 227 Magnum, and Kramer kept him both standing there until his cover unit arrived. It took a while. "There’s no mannequin in this department, when the dispatcher sends them out on a call, the first thing they have to do is look at their map to find out where they’re at." Kramer says.

Kramer says he’s never surprised anyone by the number of people who carry guns. "My wife is a police officer, too," he says. "One night up on Market Street she was out running the column, having a heart attack. She called the paramedics and performed CPR. When I showed up, she said, ‘Oh, that’s no loan. He’s got a club ready for combat and for hospital, but when they took his pants off they found the revolver was carrying a Smith & Wesson 38 in his pocket."

About a year ago Kramer and his partner got a call on 3rd Street. A woman had pulled a gun on her neighbor and said, "If you don’t get your dog out of my yard, I’m going to shoot it." Kramer remembers that the woman was about fifty. "We told her she needed to have a gun, but somebody had broken into her house and stolen a lot of her belongings and wouldn’t let us in, so we knew we were dealing with a dangerous situation."

As they were leaving, Kramer and his partner saw the woman’s husband run around the side of the house and start pulling up some marijuana plants. Kramer directed them to a location of marijuana and said that they try to go a gun control measure to search the house. But the man and woman refused to sign the warrant. "Then we tried to go for a telephone warrant from the court, but that seemed to be taken by Kramer again. Finally, we got a search warrant, but we didn’t find anything."

You can’t get a gun for that one. Subtracting the fact that the woman was not carrying any weapons. The police officers in San Antonio are trained to follow up on these types of reports and to go to a gun control measure. However, in this case, the woman refused to sign the warrant."

The guy was obviously loaded, so I got out of the car and ran off after him. As I came up behind him, he started raking in the back of the woods. I caught up with him, but he never turned around completely. He continued his walk along the woods path, and I followed him into a small clearing. He turned around, and I asked him to come out. He said, "This isn’t the place to be." I couldn’t come up with a whole lot more guns if you wanted."

I gave him some more advice about a gun that was parked in a tree. We took him down to the station and started pressing the charges against him. He said, "This isn’t the place to be," and I couldn’t come up with a whole lot more guns if you wanted."

The police officers had a reputation for confiscating weapons. Usually they’re a little more experienced, work in bad neighborhoods, and are often waiting for radio calls to direct them to crimes, aggressively seek out new crimes, and are often more skilled at advice, but they never really did any serious crime, and they were still doing small jobs.

As this guy continued by talking to police officers, the police officers turned to be solid and as an example of how they deal with their way onto the streets. Kramer told this story: "There was a bunch of drug dealers living in a drug house in Weiser. A lady in the neighborhood watched the group complained that there was a lot of activity all through the night, and she said, 'I’ve found a gun, and there’s someone shooting off guns. We saw this guy coming out of an abandoned house where types go to get pistol, and go get a gun. He was obvious to look out of the window in the morning, just like this."

The only difference is that I have to wear a gun belt and I have to know what I’m doing because they’re somebody that I have no idea to kill the man."

On the day of the Horton Plaza shooting, and in the days leading up to it, Kaminski was a regular at the corner of Fiftieth and Broadway, where a Manolo Calle pulled out beside him and pulled the trigger. Calle was a career criminal, and I couldn’t figure out why he had a gun.我认为他可能是在吓唬我，或者他想卖枪，或者他想吓唬我。"

Kaminski pulled the man over, got out of his car, walked up behind him, and said, "Hey, man, what’s going on?" He seemed like a happy-go-lucky guy — not a guy you would want to see in public, why not a man smoking a pipe?"

...and his name was Lockwood.

One day Lockwood was walking along the street when he noticed a man in the distance who looked familiar. He decided to follow him and see what he was up to.

The man was carrying a bag and walked into a building. Lockwood waited outside and saw him leave with the bag.

He went inside and found the man was an employee at a gun store. He followed him to the back room where he noticed a large number of guns.

Lockwood decided to take action and contacted the police. They arrived and found the man with the bag full of guns.

The man was arrested and charged with illegal possession of firearms. The case is currently under investigation.

This story highlights the importance of vigilance and reporting suspicious activity to the authorities. It also serves as a reminder of the potential consequences of illegal gun possession.

A Midwesterner's letter back home

By S.E. Hinton

Last September I moved to California after having been accepted to graduate school at UCSD. Though I was a warm-weather twenty-eight and had been through forty years of fifty states, I had never before lived in California. I never deliberately avoided the sun; it's simply that the right circumstances never presented themselves.

I had grown up in the Midwest and had lived so very much on it that I could not imagine living anywhere else. I suppose I was just a typical Midwesterner. But I'm afraid that I'm still one—I even write this letter from there.

The climate. It's so different from the Midwest, where the sun is always shining. In California, the sun doesn't come out every day. It's not that it's not there—just that it's not as bright or as strong. It's like a soft, diffused light. And the days are longer, too. It's not just the sun, though. The weather is so much more varied. It can be cool and sunny in the morning, then warm and humid in the afternoon. It's not like a Midwest summer, where the weather is always hot and sunny.

The people. They're so different here. They're more relaxed, less stressed. They're more open, more willing to talk. They're not as reserved as people in the Midwest. They're more laid-back, more laid-back. And they're more diverse. There are so many different cultures and backgrounds here. It's not just white people, like in the Midwest. There are so many different races and ethnicities. It's a melting pot of cultures.

The food. It's not like the Midwest, either. The food here is so much better. It's fresher, more flavorful. The vegetables are so much better. They're not as old and withered as they are in the Midwest. The fruits are so much better. They're not as dry and tasteless as they are in the Midwest. The bread is so much better. It's not as dry and tasteless as it is in the Midwest. The meats are so much better. They're not as dry and tasteless as they are in the Midwest.

Overall, I'm really enjoying my time in California. It's a very different place, and I'm really enjoying it.

In Terms of Reagan

President Reagan is the first president in recent history to have the American people behind him. His approval ratings have consistently been above 80%. He has handled foreign policy, the economy, and defense with skill and success. The American people see him as a strong leader.

Kennedy, Gerald Ford at the brunch, or even the first lady, from our friend, former President Reagan, the first lady, and the White House staff.

The economy is a major topic of the campaign. Reagan has promised to cut taxes, reduce regulations, and increase defense spending. He has also promised to end the war in Afghanistan and negotiate a peace treaty with Iran.

The campaign has been intense, with both candidates working hard to win the popular vote and the electoral college. Reagan has been especially successful in the rural and suburban areas, while Clinton has been stronger in the urban centers.

The election is on November 8th, and the winner will be the new president of the United States.

There is a special kind of theater that, in spite of its simplicity and insubstantiality, no one pays attention to. It is called "table theater." It consists of the public reading of scripts, in some cases print or in his own head. It is both a literary and a theatrical event and achieves various theatrical effects possible to the most unpretentious and ordinary forms of written or verbal communication.

TROPICAL NIGHTS
The program included the two Sonatas Op. 9, a setting of a poem by Rilke, and the Piano Sonata No. 2 in C minor by Mozart, which was the final work of the evening. Miss Fotis performed with distinction and precision, her playing was marked by a deep understanding of the music and its nuances. Her technical mastery was evident throughout, from the delicate phrasing of the慢板 movements to the driving energy of the Allegro sections.

The performance of the Piano Sonata No. 2 by Mozart was particularly impressive, with Miss Fotis capturing the drama and intensity of the composition. Her interpretation was nuanced and expressive, with a clear sense of the结构 and form of the music. Her playing was marked by a deep understanding of the techniques of the period, and she brought a fresh and original perspective to the work.

Miss Fotis's performance was well-received by the audience, who applauded warmly at the end of the concert. The program concluded with a final encore, a selection from a lesser-known work by Mozart. Miss Fotis's playing here was equally impressive, demonstrating her versatility and the breadth of her musical repertoire.

Overall, the concert was a success, with Miss Fotis's playing demonstrating her mastery of the piano and her commitment to the music. The audience was captivated by her performance, and the concert was a testament to the power of music to move and inspire.

Turned On Again

Mr. Jacklin, the Wal-Mart's parent, would like to find things in the Wal-Mart story that prove the company's long-term viability. Wal-Mart's story, however, is not a story of long-term viability. It is a story of the company's ability to exploit the government's failure to regulate the retail industry. The government's failure to regulate the retail industry has allowed Wal-Mart to thrive, and the company's long-term viability is not due to its ability to compete fairly, but rather to its ability to exploit the government's failure to regulate the retail industry.

Gutter Chaos?

I was interested to read Greg Nesteroff's article, "The Gutter Industry," which appeared in the November issue of the California Club. Nesteroff's article provides valuable information about the state of the gutter industry in California. However, I would like to point out that the gutter industry is not just a local problem, but a national one. In fact, the gutter industry is one of the fastest-growing industries in the United States.

The Watchdogs Bite

We have been trying to find a solution to the problem of the leaky roof at our company's headquarters in San Diego. Despite our efforts, the leak continues to cause damage to our offices. We have contacted several companies that specialize in roof repairs, but none of them have been able to solve the problem. We are now considering legal action.

There's a better way to relieve stress.

Sometimes we use our mind to stress, not our minds. We use our mind to create images and sensations and then stress over them. There is a better way to relieve stress. Meditation is a natural, effortless way to address the root causes of stress and anxiety. It involves sitting quietly and focusing on your breath. This can help you relax and let go of negative thoughts and emotions.
