Play In Normal Heights

Drams students at Franklin Elementary school have been tudying artistic expression by helping their teacher write a play about pacifiam, child abuse, and parental neglect. Last month the aspiring young actors learned about consorship when their controversial three-act play was canceled by the school principal. And they got a lesson in artistic commitment when they saw their teacher disregard the principal's order disregard the principal's order when they saw their teacher disregard the principal's order and move rehearsals for Child's Peace to a community hall ten blocks from their Normal Heights schoolheuse. To give only a few examples, the chef who opened the Abbey flew over to Judson's; the former chef at Cafe Pacifica winged his way to Broadway Pleac; the chef who supervised the Grant Grill has already been replaced by the man who estaceaby been replaced by the Grant Rancho Santa Fe; the talented chef from Rheppard's Cheraton Easty settled in with Piret's. Any number of assistants, sous-hefs and kitchen helpers claim that they ruled some part of the roots at either piret's or Gustaf Anders; both these places appear to be responsible for flocks of aspiring cooks. Last year I heard that the La Valencia Hotel in La Jolla had obtained the services of a famous chef from France, but this had only a glancing effect on me. I rarely dine at any of the three rooms at the La Valencia: it's too close to home, it's the first place we ever dined when we arrived at these shores, and the style and quality of the food never seemed to change or vary a jot through the years. It was as if the same hand produced the adecades.

Recently, however, I had a visitor whose fondness for the La Valencia remains undimmed and who eats there amoust daily during her winter stays. On a recent misty night, we had the Sundowner of fixed-price meals range in price from $10.50 to $11.25 and offer a choice of soop or sailed, a selection of five entres, plus desert and beverage. I found the braised short ribs ($30.50) excellent.

Perhaps because it is scorned as a pes-tering little brother by Los Angeles and a frontier town by East Coast sophisticates, San Diego is becoming the Andy Grana-telli of the entertainment business — evtelli of the entertainment business — ev-eryone comes here to do their tune-ups. Lily Tomlin road-tested her one-woman show at the Old Globe Theatre before it became a smash in New York City; the musical Big River coursed through the La Jolla Playhasse before sweeping down Broadway last year to pick up seven Tony Awards; and more and more pop music acts are beginning national tours at local somes. Just last Friday, a near-capacity audience at La Paloma Theater in Encincian winnessed Mightyn Real, Brut One, the new one-woman show in which emerging lacent Sandra Bernhard juggles her hat trick of acting, singing, and connedy. Little effort was made to conceal the fact that this was hardly more than a tune-up for Bernhard's show the following night at L.A.'s Beverly Theatre, where she'd be on

OUARTER NOTES

SAN DIEGO SYMPHONY

When the San Diego Symphony moved to its new home at the beginning of this season, there was tremendous excitement: last-minute excitement: last-minute touches in the renovation of the Fox. Theatre (now Symphony Hall), a gala opening, a lavish fundraising dinner-dance, articles in all the papers. But as articles in all the papers. But as themselves began, two or three a week, week after week, interest dropped off. At each concert, particularly on Thursday evenings, a large proportion of the seats remained empty: at least a third of the house, and sometimes more. The emptiness was especially noticeable in the grand tier, that front section of the balcony for which subscribers had to pay immense premiums; the wealthy supporters of the Symphony, having made their organization, did not seem organization, did not seem very interested in actually attending the orchestra's superformances. What they and touches in the renovation of the very interested in actually attending the orchestra's performances. What they and the other absentees missed was a series of first-rate concerts, beautifully played by excellent musicians who had been welded by music director.

Meanwhile, the Symphony's financial problems were mounting, to the point where suddenly, without warning, the board of directors was proclaiming the imminence of bankruptcy if two million dollars were not raised within a couple of weeks to pay off the accumulated deficit. Confronted with this crisis, accumulated deficit.

Surely this situation is as Surcly this situation is as upsetting as the Symphony's financial woes — even more so. Admittedly, last week's Mozart concert was not very exciting in musical terms (not to speak of its insignificance only to be expected — as a hot news item). There seemed a general atmosphere of moral exhaustion and irritability, no doubt the require of the crisis. doubt the result of the crisis atmosphere of the previous week and of the natural week and of the natural letdown when it became evident that the financial problems of the Symphony are not yet over (for there is still talk of shortening the season and reducing the salaries of musicians who are already the lowest paid orchestra members of any major American symphony orchestra). Everything was competent, but the electric excitement of the previous week's concerts was absent, and the gen: ral level of performance was perceptibly (though certainly not disastrously) lower than what disastrously) lower than what we have become used to during bland and routine, one found oneself paying attention to more trivial matters and experiencing irritations that one might otherwise have ignored. The program began with the overture to Mitridate, a very sight work from Mozart's fourteenth year, useful to hear for purely historical interest, but not calculated to fill an audience with enthusiasm. Then there was one of those through the program of in which the stage is rearranged for a piano concerto (in this case, No. 23 in A, K. 488). No one at Symphony Hall seems to have a sense of showmanship, or any ingenuity or enterprise in devising ways to avoid these lengthy, boring interruptions in the pacing of concerts, interruptions during which the audience's emotional temperature tends to fall in a audienc's emotional temperature tends to fall to a level suitable to hibernation. Why not set up the piano at the very beginning of the concert and play the very brief overture on a stage already prepared for the entrance of the pianist and the immediate commencement of the concertor?

prompted to gripe, I suppose, if the concerto itself had been performed with more excitement. This is one of Mozart's greatest works — the recordings by Rubinstein, Perahia, and Clare Haskil (this Perahia, and Clare Haskil (this last above all) give a full sense of its magic, the wistful grace, the exquisite poignancy for the slow movement, the ebullience of the finale. Miss Cooper played coolly and carefully, always in good taste, and with a respectful reverence for the score; she was technically quite at home in the music; but neither she nor the orchestra seemed to care very deeply about this music. There was a similar sense of competence and indifference in the performance of the Horn Concerto No. 2, K. 417. Things were perceptibly better in the Symphony No. 40 in G Minor, K. 550, which concluded this decent, workaday, rather uninspired concert. But, all in all, this was not one of the San Diego Symphony's finest hours.

(continued from page 16) Sanctorum," opens with Gothic pipe organ and maintains an ominous attitude that would not be out of place in an old Vincen Fried movie, Another, Grimly Fiendish" (a big hit in England last year), follows a marching harpsichord through a poppish, Victorian melodrama that by turns sounds like late-Sixties Beatles, Kinks, Who, and Doors, Perhaps most unusual of all is an instrumental, "Trojans," that sounds like the sort of that sounds like the sort of moody, synthesized track Jan Hammer would compose for one of those high-tech love scenes in Miami Vice. Yet beneath the cascading synths, tinkling, neoclassical piano, Al Stewart-like sax riffs, and art-rockish feints, lies the still-beating heart of the old beating heart of the old Dammed. Somehow the hand has managed to add a thick coat of varnish to his studio effort without obscuring the grainy ungency of their earlier sound. Indeed, Phantiamagoria should accomplish to slopic, the old attracting new fars white accomplish to slopic, the old tracting new fars white "It took me a while to get used to the new album," admitted Kenas, the publisher of the local alternative music bimonthly Lively Arts and possibly the biggest Danmed fan hereabouts. But it grows on you after a few listenings. Phantisamogaria may be a radical departure for them, but Street of Derams. 'Shadow of Lowe, and 'Is It a Dream?' are classic songs in the Danmed mold. And they play with the same intensity as always: it's just Damned make their San Diego debut Monday night at downtown's California Theatre. If the bend's recent gig in Santa Monica was any indication, this should be a memorable concert should be a memorable concert for Damned fans — old or new. Opening will be Social Distortion.

An important consideration that I believe is too often overlooked in discussions of jazz violinists is the most same intensity as always; it's just that they came to realize that they couldn't keep playing in the style that made sense ten years ago." Nevertheless, there should ago." Nevertheless, there should be an appreciable contingent of thrashers present when the obvious: the instrument itself. Let's face it — the violin is not an instrument tailor-made for jamming. Unlike instruments that are fitted with frets, valves, or levered keys, the violin dare: or levered keys, the violin dares its operator to achieve acceptable intonation. As any student of the violin will tell you, mastering the precise placement of the fingers on the instrument's thin, smooth neck takes years, in the meantime, even the most rudimentary. even the most rudimentary scalar exercise can come out sounding like sound effects for B-grade horror film. The vast majority of persevering souls who develop superior skills of articulation on the violin do so only after countless hours spent first training the fingers to navigate the chromatic and diatonic scales of Western music diatonic scales of Western must and then applying that digital finesse to the body of classical violin literature. That's great in the musician intends to play in symphony or chamber ensembl or to give recitals. But all too often, the same precision and musical logic that took so long to acquire prove a hindrance when a violinist attempts to tackle other musical idioms, especially those that emphasize vamping or improvisation.

Listen to a classically trained violinist for the first time trying his hand at jazz or rock or bluegrass. Predictably, he'll sound stiff, somewhat spiritless. Without a score to provide him with eaxet information about rotes, phrasing, dynamics, and tempo, almost inwariably he'll resort to musical shorthand—resort to musical shorthand—resort to musical shorthand—in the scales to which he's been tied for years or long, legato lines that allow him time to think of something to play. For many such musicans, the road to freewheeling jazz improvisation is a tough one. It improvisation is a tough one. It improvisation is a tough one it improvisation is a tough one. It improvisation is a tough one it improvisation in a tough one it improvisation is a tough one it improvisation in a tough one in the improving the interval in the improving the interval in the improving the improving the interval in the interval in the interval in the interval interval in the interval interv manicured lawns for most of one's musical life. Few violinists can make the transition, and fewer still can thereafter make a worthwhile contribution to jazz improvisation. That's why you can practically count the number of formidable jazz violinists on one hand and why John Blake is fast becoming the forefinger on that hand. After matriculating at Settlement Music School and West Virginis state University the Philadelphia-born Blake attended the Institute for Advanced Musical Studies in Montreux, Switzerland, and eventually won a scholarship to violinist Zim Farnecescotti. A grant from the National Endowment for the Arts grant from the National Endowment for the Arts enabled Blake to widen his musical aperture by studying the Southern Carnatic violin style of India, an experience that would loosen any musician's joints. But Blake took his first decisive step Blake took his first decisive step toward his current career in the early Seventies when jazz saxophonist Archie Shepp hired him to play on some recording sessions. Since then, a succession of such jazz greats as McCoy Tyner, James Newton, Cecil McBee, Grover Washington, Jr., and Jay Hoggard have utilized Blake's skills. It was in Washington's mid-Seventies jazz-rhythm and blues band that Blake came to prominence, and the critics have been raving about him ever been raving about him ever since.

It's terrific that noted jazz, either called Blake the most important new format part of the past several part of the past of the past formalist straightjacket with which intensive training can stricture a musician. Unlike such admittedly great crossover violinists as Jean-Luc Ponty, Jerry Goodman, and Michael Urbaniak, Blake's playing has a feel and a flow that doesn't draw inordinate strention to act inordinate attention to self-conscious virtuosity. Like a free spirit running down a sidewalk with one foot off the curb, Blake with one foot off the curh, Blake alternates straight-ahead propriety with a jagged indicess, stopping occasionally to sing with sweet sentiment or testifyin ferror or spiraling around a tonic role before swinging free to explore some coolic, modal alleysus. There is emotion in Blakes playing, a mode mode of the properties of the properties of the violation warm, familiar tone and transforms the straigest. and transforms the strictest linear patterns into disembodied melodies that drift through the mind like motivic poltergeists. On his most recent Gramavision Records release.

Twinkling of an Ege, Blake demonstrates the limber phrasing and neoromantic sensibilities that have combine with his street smarts and academic technical proficiency to make him the critics' choice among "underappreciated" among "underappreciated talents." He also displays the versatility that marks the versatility that marks the musician who seeks and learns the largest possible number of languages in which to converse with his instrument. On the album's aerobic opener, "La Verdad," Blake tackles with crisp double-stops and brisk scalar sweeps the sort of Spanish romanticism we associate with Chick Corea. Elsewhere he orings a sensitive, economi vamping style to cruising bop; wends sensually through the wends sensually through the contemporary wicings of pop-jazz, revives the conjugal spirit that characterized jazz-rock fusion before that music became a plaything of jazz

THERMOGRAPHY: Helping us prove

It's often hard to prove injuries in a personal injury case. X-rays don't always work. A thermogram is a colored photo which reveals differences in body temperature. An injury will show up as a brighter color on a thermogram than surrounding body areas.

areas.

By using thermograms in certain cases, we are able to prove injuries that may otherwise have escaped detection.

OFF THE CUFF What was your favorite movie of the year?

months ago — Johnny Dangerously. It was very funny, very creative. It's a spoof of all the gangster movies I've ever seen. There movies I've ever seen. There were a lot of cameo appearances — Peter Boyle, Joe Picaça, Nauren Stapleton. She was just great. Normally she's such a staid actress, so some of the remarks in the movie were totally unexpected. Very effective. I'm much more comfortable watching videos at home; movie theaters are just not for me. I might not see a movie until a few years after it's been released, but that's fine. I also like Just 82 it, I played on the spoof too. "You can't fight city hall"; that was the theme.

Feizure. It was really funny, it's about this rectool where kids learn to make hamburgers.
They have trainees and stuff, and everyone hopes to graduate into the real world to work at a hamburger stand. The sergeant makes everything hard on the kids so they won' ig raduate.
White suite and limousine, comes to check on the school, everything is a wreck. The sarge tries to blame everything on the kids. Then a chicken truck crashes into the school and chickens are flying everywhere. One student, set and burs one of the chickens, but then when she bites into it, she says, "Oh God, it's tasty!"
The owner lows it and it becomes their new moto. The students all graduate, and the sarge gets promoted to a paper picker-upper.

Kearny Mesa I'd tell people to see Creator. It was never released at the movies, but it's available on VHS and Beta. It stars Peter O'Toole as an eccentric science professor at a university. He's a lovable character, obsessed with wanting to re-create his belowed deceased wife Lucy. I think this is also Marie! Hemingaway, best rule. She think this is also Marie! Hemingway best role. She plays a sociative college student. It's a philosophical memory of the college student. It's a philosophical memorions of life — love, fath. O'Toole's character is spreading the word about the "big picture" in life. God, it's so hard to explain when you see such a wonderful movie with such emotional draw. It's so well filmed and directed. You must see it. A mother movie I'd recommend is Lost in America for people who haven't seen it. Very furny.
