UP FOR DOPTION

When had what should have been an idyllic childhood as the pampered son of Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman turned into a daily nightmare? Did it begin when I was seven years olds, or had it started long before then? Or was the real tragedy how I was affected in later life, as an adult still groping for acceptance, still hiding my shame from the increasingly prying eyes of the world?

PICTURE STORY

by the San Diego Historical Society

Main Street, El Cajon, 1898. The westward view captures the rural flavor of the growing town; note the horse-and-buggy rigs, unpawed street, and the absence of sidewalks. Like many other San Diego County settlements, El Cajon's origins lay in the giant land grants awarded to friends or relatives of various Mexican governors in the early- to mid-1800s as war between the United States and Mexico seemed imminent. (Prior to Mexican possession, the land had been waterdo over by the Spanish padres and their Indian charges, who herded eartle and tended vineyards and corn on the acreage.) The 48,799-acre El Cajón Rancho was the third-largest such grant in the county, given to Doha Maria Antonia Estudiblo de Pedrorena in 1845. The largest section of the county, given to Jone Maria Antonia Estudino de Pedrofena in 1906. He diagest Section et au rancho was sold in 1868 to a San Francisco capitalist named Issac Lankershim for the princely sum of less than $1 dollar per acre; Lankershim divvied up the acres and invited realtors and businessmen to settle the wide-open space. Today, the boundaries of the original rancho encompass Lakeside, El Cajon, Santee, Bostonia and Flinn Springs.
