A recurring nightmare I've had since childhood is confinement, imprisonment, shackles, guards, and escape.

One exquisite, torturous dream, an epic of paranola and suspense, is the one about the concentration camp.

I'm in this Dachau-like compound, somehow dig my way out to a vast forest, which, as it turns out, is ultimately surrounded by wire and klieg lights; I climb the fence, over the barbed wire, and enter a town. The town appears normal in every way:

shops and streets, people walking their dogs, etc. Before long I discover that the town is a fake. It is an extension of the vast Chinese puzzle box prison system. The smiling civilians are all trustees who turn me in to the guards, and I am back in the concentration camp.

I usually wake up stifling a scream. Sometimes it doesn't get stifled. The cops came to my door one time; a neighbor complained. I just told the cops I had these nightmares. They seemed to understand.

I met Legacy at the Southern California Writers' Conference at the Sheraton Four Points in Kearny Mesa, where I was giving a couple of talks. Legacy looked like an A&R man for a record company in the '70s or a Hollywood agent: his jet hair was tied back in a ponytall; he wore colorless square-rimmed eyeglasses, a navy three-piece suit with tasteful red-tinged necktie. He carried a briefcase.
