Trchitects. Contractors. Lumber recailers. Building professionals everywhere are realizing that of all the uses of an old growth redwood, it still works best as a tree. With only 4% of our ancient redwoods remaining, it isn't surprising that people are beginning to understand that destroying our national heritage is no longer acceptable. • But the battle isn't over yet. Archaic companies still plan to log the last unprotected ancient redwood groves on Earth. If we want to save the remaining redwood wilderness, such as the Headwaters Forest owned by Pacific Lumber, we must stop buying old-growth redwood products. If we don't buy it, they won't cut it. Alternatives exist, including certified, recycled and composite redwood. Please support building professionals who value ancient redwoods as irreplaceable living monuments, not assets to be measured in board-feet.

What our beer looks like.

As you can see, Black Star looks pretty much like most beers. Crisp golden color, good bubbles, nice foamy head. But that's where the similarities end.

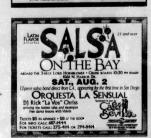

Originating in Whitefish, Montana, Black Star is brewed with only select Western two-row malting barley and Czech Saaz and Mount Hood hops. In fact, it's doublehopped for a rich flavor and clean, refreshing finish.

Yet, for all of its premium ingredients, Black Star costs only a few cents more than the well-known national beers it happens to look like.

I think the parents have the right to say something about what is told to their kids at school if it is something having to do with religious or moral beliefs. You have to have a moral beliefs. You have to nave a right to protect your own values. I don't think it undermines the shoot's authority and, even if it did, I think the schools have too much author-ity. I don't think parents these days have enough authority over their kids. They should be able to say no to anything they object to at school.
